THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

GEORGE R. GRAHAM & CO. PUBLISHERS.

NUMBER NINETY-EIGHT CHESNUT STREET.

TWO DOLLARS A-YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS: DEVOTED TO GENERAL INTELLIGENCE, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, MORALITY, AGRICULTURE, AND AMUSEMENT.

VOLUME XXII. PHILADELPHIA, AUGUST 27, 1842. WHOLE NO. 1100.

Original Novel.

THE OLD LOYALIST.

A Tale of the American Revolution.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY THE AUTHOR OF "LEAVES FROM A LAWYER'S FORT FOLIO."

"To write in such a manner wise,
Which may be wisdom to the wise,
And play to them that lost to play."—Gower.

CHAPTER XIII.

"Here stands the victim."—The Woodman.
"To lust a single murder."—Fatal Curiosity.

In one of those old-fashioned, wainscotted apartments which are yet to be seen in antique houses, Stanley walked to and fro, as if disturbed in thought, the morning after the capture of Ernest. The brow of the English captain was knit, and his appearance betokened that he had been a stranger to repose, unless, perhaps, for a short interval, during the preceding night. He had, in truth, been kept awake by the conflict of his passions, arising from the opposing motives which influenced him in the disposition of his prisoner, for while prudence, as well as a sense of duty urged him to forward Ernest to head quarters, his hatred inclined him to seize the present moment, and avenge himself by the death of his rival. Stanley was not without some feelings of honor; but, in the present case, he was smarting under the consciousness of the exposure of his villainy at the interview between Ernest and Col. Harcourt on the preceding day, a fact of which his emissary had, as we have seen, informed him. The temptation, therefore, to wreak condign and speedy vengeance on his rival was scarcely to be resisted, fraught though the act would be with danger to himself. Still, however, Stanley paused before he determined, but the fear that Ernest, if sent to head quarters might, in some possibility, escape, and the desire to glut his vengeance over the dying agonies of his rival, finally prevailed over the dictates of prudence and the faint whispetings of conscience. The struggle, however, consumed nearly the whole night, and when long after midnight Stanley threw himself on his couch, sleep fled from his pillow, or came attended by frightful dreams, from which he awoke in horror. Shuddering at the vague terrors of his disordered brain, he hesitated whether he should not retract his resolution, but his evil genius prevailed, and, with a sneer at his weakness, he said,

"What! shall a sick dream rob me of my rival's blood!—no, by heaven! he dies!" and he struck the table with his clenched hand. "He has crossed me in battle, thwarted me in love, despoiled me of my honor, and I will have revenge, ay! deep, bitter revenge, even if I sacrifice my soul. This post is partly independent, and those are wild and disorderly times,—why cannot I pass his death off as that of a suspected refugee, executed in a moment of sudden heat? Ah! that is the very thought,—what devil ever placed it in my head! Revenge is a sweet morsel to the deeply injured, and well will I roll it under my tongue. And my revenge will be all the sweeter because this proud beauty will hear of it, and know that—I, I the despised and loathed Stanley, have done the deed. Sweet Mistress Edith," and a bitter scorn was on his lips and in his tone, "you will then, perchance, remember the old false of avowing the tiger. But away with all thoughts of the pretty doll! Other matters should occupy the mind. What is to be done, should he done quickly," and advancing to the door, he called to the sentry without, "What ho! there—bring the prisoner into the parlor," and passing down the hall to the designated apartment, he awaited in apparent composure but real emotion the appearance of his intended victim.

Little did Ernest know of the outrage which was contemplated against him, for though he was well aware that his capture within the British lines would render him liable to be treated as a spy, and though he knew that all the influence of his rival would be exerted to place his cast in the worst aspect, yet the thought never flashed across his mind, that Stanley would so wantonly outrage every law human and divine, as to murder his prisoner. Ernest, however, had made up his mind to his ultimate death, believing escape impossible, and knowing that no earthly power could save him. The reflection that he was so soon to be cut off from life and all its sweetness had lightened his misery in his present frame of mind. A few days before, when he was borne down by his parent's curse, and when he deemed Edith shut off from him forever, death would have been hailed with joy; but now, when his father had forgiven him, and when Edith had once promised to be his, to be thus sacrificed was agony itself. The circumstances, too, in which his death would have the now unprotected girl occurred to him with peculiar bitterness. But Ernest never faced the idea of his death as a coward and a man, and he resolved when the time should come, to meet his fate without a murmur. He rejoiced that Edith was ignorant of his present danger, and he resolved—much as to sacrifice a parting interview would cost him—not to apprize her of his situation until all was over, when a letter, to be written the night before his execution, would be delivered to her. If he grieved that the privilege of witnessing his father's sepulchre was denied him, he found some alleviation for his sorrow in the thought that his parent had died in peace with him, and that he had closed that parent's eyes. Revolving these things in his mind, he lay down to repose, and, exhausted by the events of the day, fell into a profound sleep, in which he dreamed of happiness and Edith. He was awakened an hour after sunrise by the sentinel, who rudely shaking the sleeper by the shoulder, said,

"You sleep as if you had a clear conscience, especially considering that you may be reckoned as good as dead already. But cheer up, my brave," he continued, more feelingly, "death is a fate that must befall us all, and it matters little whether it comes by a ball to-day, or a hempen cravat to-morrow, or a sickness that tortures one out of existence in a bed years hence. I have come to take you before Capt. Stanley, who will send you, I suppose, to head quarters."

"I attend you," said Ernest, when he had stirred himself—"lead on." But stay—I believe my rank entitles me to precedence," and bowing to the soldier he passed first out of the door. A few steps brought him to the parlor, and with a courteous, though general salutation to those in the room, and a haughty nod to his rival, he stood confronting Stanley, who, occupying a chair at the head of the apartment, and surrounded by several subaltern officers, eyed him sternly in return. For a minute both remained silent. There they stood face to face, the accuser and the accused, regarding one another as though each would read the soul of his rival. At length Stanley spoke.

"You are a rebel and a spy!"

"I am an American gentleman," said Ernest, "a captain in the Continental line, and neither a rebel nor a spy."

"This shall not serve your turn," said Stanley, "You are no more a captain in the rebel army than yonder corporal is a Field Marshal; and your dress is but assumed to bear out a lying story, and aid you to escape your merited death. If you are captain at all, it is among refugees and robbers. For such villains we have a short shrift and a shorter rope."

"I repeat again," said Ernest, endeavoring to calm his passion at this reply, though the color mounted to his cheek, "that I am an American officer. I cause hither to see a dying father—"

"A dying father!" sneered Stanley, "and pray for what does did you come?"

"Perhaps to circumvent the arts of a villain," steadily retorted Ernest, "you, at least, Capt. Stanley, know what I mean."

"By ——, sir," said his rival, hurried out of all command was himself, "do you know that I can send you, with a word, to the next ditch or tree?"

Every cheek, except Ernest's, turned a shade whiter at this implied threat. But the prisoner's eye quailed not, nor did a single tone of his voice falter as he replied,

"All this you can, perhaps, do; but you never will."

"Why not? By heaven and earth," and he spoke hurriedly and passionately, "why will I not do this?"

"Because it would be against all military law—because it would be a base and dishonorable murder—and because three days ago I had you in range of my musket, and disdained to take your life at such advantage."

"Now, by the God above us," said Stanley, inflamed to double fury by the calm tone of the speaker, and by the allusion to their meeting on the battle field at Germantown, "Now, by the God above us, you have bought on yourself your fate. Do you dare here to taunt me with your cold-blooded attempt at assassination—do you talk foul treason in my presence! Murder will your punishment be forsooth!—then murder let it be; but murder or not, it shall be inflicted on you forthwith. You are a spy, and shall die the death of a spy. I give you five minutes," and he drew forth his watch and laid it on the table, "to prepare for your doom."

Even the subordinates of Stanley, hardened as they were to scenes of wanton outrage, started and looked incredulously into each others faces, as if surprised out of all disguise at the murder contemplated in these words. Ernest heard his sentence pronounced with astonishment and indignation, but he knew that his rival's eye was on him, and he proudly checked every outward manifestation of emotion. But he did not, therefore, cease to feel. No one in the full flush of health and hope, can hear that he has but a few minutes to live, without many and various sensations. Ernest's whole life seemed to pass in swift array before him—his infancy, his boyhood, his early love, his alienation from his father; hope and fear, emotion and tenderness, every even and feeling that had chequered his existence, rushed vividly across his memory. In that moment he lived an age. But the bitterest thought of all was that he should be deprived of even the melancholy pleasure of writing a farewell to Edith; and, as this reflection crossed his mind, his fortitude almost gave way; but catching the eye of Stanley fixed in triumph on him, he looked proudly up and was himself again. For a space, during which one might have counted ten seconds, or a pin been heard to drop on the floor, he continued that stern, defying gaze, until the eye of his rival fell before his own, when, looking around the room, and drawing himself loftily up, he said,

"I take you all to witness—enemies though you be by the laws of war, yet still brothers by the ties of blood and nature—that I die a death of foul wrong. As an American officer, taken with arms in my hands, and wearing my uniform undisguised, I claim the rights and immunities of a prisoner of war—or, if I am to be regarded as a spy—against which I protest—I demand to be sent forward to head-quarters and tried by a proper court martial—"

Ernest had proceeded thus far unchecked, when Stanley, rising in agitation from his seat, his cheek flushed with passion, exclaimed,

"You have forfeited, base traitor, the grace I would have given you by appealing to these troops, and endeavoring to stir mutiny in loyal hearts. I said you should have five minutes—you shall not have one. Sergeant, detail six files, draw them up in front of the house, and remove the prisoner."

Hitherto, even those who knew the reckless nature of Stanley, had believed that his threat of executing Ernest was not intended to be carried out; but at these fatal words a shudder of horror ran through the room, and every eye was turned on the prisoner to see how he would receive his doom. But as before, his eye did not quail beneath that of his murderer. For an instant, however, he remained silent, and during that interval no sound except the irregular gasping breath of the spectators, was heard in the wide apartment. But now Ernest, lifting his voice clearly, exclaimed,

"God will avenge this murder—ay! and I tell you, Captain Stanley, you yourself shall rue this day. I die a sacrifice to villainy; but I think the Almighty, that I have saved one being at least, from your infamous arts."

"Remove the prisoner," shouted Stanley, white with rage, "what, ho! you idle varlets. Stop the brawling and seditious traitor."

"Hands off!" said Ernest, shaking loose, with a giant's strength, the grasp of the soldiers who advanced to seize him, "I have done—lead on!"

Shocked and paralyzed, yet conscious of the uselessness of expostulation, the subordinates moved mechanically to the door to behold the last act in this foul tragedy; and if Ernest had required consolation, he might have found it in the sympathizing looks of those who were, by the laws of war, his enemies. Many a veteran's cheek was wet as he gazed on the victim, though their grief was mingled with admiration at his proud and unshaken demeanor. But this composure was wormwood to the heart of Stanley. He had looked for some petition for a few hours delay,—and his heart had gloated in anticipation over the pleasure to be experienced in denying the boon; but when he saw that no such delay was sought, and that the lock of his victim did not even blanch at the fell decree, his rage became almost ungovernable, and was increased when he noticed the sympathy with which so many of his troop regarded Ernest. But, forced to conceal his anger, the intensity of his passion was evident only by the ghastly pallor of his cheek, and the firm compression of his lips.

A gently sloping lawn stretched before the house, and on this open spot the contemplated execution was to take place. A few minutes sufficed to complete the hasty preparations for the tragedy. The prisoner was buried to the western extremity of the lawn, where a thick hedge, backed by a clump of dense woodland shut the grounds in from intrusive eyes. Along the foot of this hedge ran a ditch, now however dry, and its bottom covered with moss. Against the dark background of the woods and close to the edge of the ditch, the prisoner was placed in bold relief, while his executioners were arrayed in a line a few paces distant. Stanley, in person, superintended these arrangements, and his eye dilated with triumph as they drew to a close. Everything had now been completed; and the officer advanced to bind the eyes of the victim. But at this last indignity, Ernest, who had been engaged in his hurried devotions, started back, and pushing away the bandage, declared his determination to dispense with it. Again the man would have bound the victim's eyes; but again Ernest repelled him.

"I have looked death in the face before," he said, "and do not fear it now. I am a soldier. I shall not flinch at your array."

The man would have made a third attempt, but Stanley interrupted him angrily.

"Let him alone," he said—"for this parleying only delays us. Take your last look on heaven and earth, sir," he continued, addressing Ernest, "Are you ready?"

Ernest drew himself up to his loftiest height, and folding his arms on his breast, looked boldly at the glittering line of muskets whose muzzles were now pointed full at his bosom. The crowd of thoughts at that minute in his heart no words can tell. Ere another tick of the clock the great secret would be unfolded to him, and he would know all of which priests and philosophers have speculated with centuries of anxious thought. Standing thus between life and death, the whole past rushed into his mind, though the future was not forgotten. The point of time which seemed to others but an instant, was to him an age, if measured by the vastness of the things thronging on his memory. And yet, though all these recollections burst upon him in such a mighty array, his outward senses, instead of being thereby weakened, became morbidly keen. It seemed as if every faculty had suddenly attained a supernatural acuteness, thus realizing the saying of the old mariners, when dying, that in that last hour his mind attained a range and power of which before he had no comprehension. Suddenly, and when his thoughts were raised in a last prayer to his Maker, preparatory to giving the signal, Ernest fancied he heard the cracking of a twig behind him on the other side of the hedge, and hesitating for the smallest possible point of time, he recognized distinctly the stealthy tread, not of one only, but of a dozen or more men. The sound could portend nothing but good, and a sudden revulsion came over him. The calmness of resigned despair, the proud fortitude of the soldier gave way at once to the exhilaration of hope. He could feel the blood rushing to his head, and the palpitations of his heart becoming unnaturally quick. Could his friends have heard of his arrest and flown to his rescue? But even while such feelings and thoughts were flashing through his mind, and ere more than half a dozen seconds had elapsed since the words of his rival, that rival, who had been watching for the signal, became impatient, and glancing from the breathless, high-souled soldier, whom a single word was to reduce to a lump of lifeless clay, he raised his sword and was in the act of pronouncing the fatal syllable,—when suddenly a quick, rattling volley burst from behind the hedge, and the murderer fell to the earth dead, even while the word for another's condemnation was issuing from his lips. Not was Stanley the only victim of that well aimed discharge. The soldiers who but a minute before were arrayed opposite the prisoner, with their shining muskets levelled full at his bosom, lay on the ground dead or dying; while others of the surrounding persons, whom the contemplated spectacle of Ernest's execution had called from the house, fell also a sacrifice. The whole passed with the rapidity of thought. The rattle of that volley had not yet subsided—the smoke still hung curling in white masses around the hedge,—and the survivors yet remained looking with blank amazement at each other, completely paralyzed by the sudden blow, when a wild hurza rose on the air, and immediately a score of dark forms, arrayed in the dress of American dragoons, each carrying a rifle, burst through the hedge, headed by an officer in whom Ernest recognized his friend Clinton. At the sight, the few remaining spectators fled to the mansion, which they proceeded to barricade. Clinton seized Ernest's arm, and stepping hastily up to the fallen Stanley, pointed to his stained sword, as if to be satisfied of his death. The first look convinced him that the murderer was no more. A ball had entered Stanley's brain just above the eye, leaving a small, dark spot from which the blood was now oozing, and causing instantaneous death. On his features still rested the smile of hatred and triumph, which had overspread them at the moment when he issued the command to fire on his victim.

"He is gone to his last account," said Clinton—"the heart will beat no more either for good or evil. He was, with all his crimes, a brave soldier—God have mercy on his soul."

"Amen!" said Ernest, now speaking for the first time; for so rapidly had the preceding events transpired, that they had seemed to him like those of a dream, and he could even yet scarcely convince himself that he was no longer a prisoner, or in the power of Stanley. But when he looked down, a second time, on that calm, still face, and saw the fearful change which stern fate had wrought there—a change not produced by the distortion of any feature, or even by the disappearance of the smile of rage and triumph, but by that indescribable something which chills the heart of the beholder with the consciousness of the presence of the dread and awful king of terrors—when he saw this, he knew then that it was all real, and that he was free. A tear gushed into his eye, nor did it shame his nature. He murmured a hasty thanksgiving to his Maker.

"And now, away. This is no place for our little force," said Clinton, "for when these fellows recover from their surprise and see our small numbers, we shall have them around our ears like a nest of hornets. Our horses are but a little distance in the wood. Follow me, and leave explanations to an hour of safety," and with these words, still holding Ernest by the hand, he dashed through the gap in the hedge by which he had entered, and was followed by his rescued friend and followers.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ah, dearer far than fiercest storm or steed,
Or the death they bear.
The heart which under thought clothes like a dove,
With love's warm wings.
In the battle—in the darkness—in the need,
Shall mate—ring to thee!
Not clam—not—since first of all the comfort, love,
It may bring to thee!—Shelley.

A short distance from the hedge, and secluded from observation by the surrounding underwood, were the horses of the detachment. These were quickly led into the neighboring road and mounted, when the party started at a brisk trot on its homeward way. Scarcely were the daring adventurers on the saddle, when they heard the alarm notes of a bugle from the quarters of the British dragoons.

"Ha! the hounds have woke up, and we shall have the pack after us in the flesh of a pistol," said Clinton, "dash on, my brave lads, dash on. We have won glory sufficient for one day, and can well afford to retreat."

The party scoured along the road at the words; and well they might, for when they reached the brow of a neighboring hill and looked back, they saw at least a hundred of the enemy in pursuit. The start, however, which had been gained by the American adventurers secured their escape, for, after a hot chase of an hour, the British drew rein, and returned to their quarters.

"Now that we are secure from molestation, with no probability of a second pursuit," said Clinton, checking his speed, in which he was imitated by the whole party, "I can afford to give you the explanation of our timely appearance, which no doubt you are longing to hear."

"How can it be otherwise!" said Ernest—"let us stop a few paces behind the rest, so that we can converse with more ease."

"Well, then, after you left me last night I began to think that your undertaking was even more dangerous than I had, at first, supposed it to be; and my fears for you were increased when I learned from a trusty farmer, a short mile from where I bid you good-bye, that Capt. Stanley, whom I knew as your rival, commanded a not of outpost, with rather unusual powers, on the extremity of the lines, in the direction of the Schuylkill. The outpost, I thought, could not be far from your father's mansion, so thinks you would probably find your rival at the house when you arrived, when, if made a prisoner, your fate would be decided by no lenient judge. This made me uneasy during the whole night, and when morning broke, and repairing to the rendezvous, I found you absent, I knew at once that you must have been made a prisoner, and probably by Stanley. I had recieved sufficiently accurate intelligence of the position of his quarters to enable me to march directly to them, but, being uncertain of his force, and therefore desirous of taking him by surprise, I consumed considerable time in approaching the place by a circuitous but stealthy route. My expectation was to find you a prisoner, but it never occurred to me—bad as I knew Stanley to be—that he would attempt to put you to death in the manner he attempted, and which would have been sheer murder. I determined, when I reached the spot, to conceal our horses in the wood and attacking the house on foot, carry it and rescue you, but when I had sent forward one of the men to reconnoitre, and he brought back word that a military execution, of which you no doubt were the subject, was going on in front of the mansion, I changed my plan. No time was to be lost. Luckily I had armed my troopers with rifles before leaving the camp with you, not knowing what duty we might be called to perform. Hurriedly organizing, we marched stealthily forward, and arrived just in time, as you know, to save you. The ball that sent Stanley to his last account was sped by myself for I would trust no one else with the task. To my others, on whom I could depend, was confided the duty of bringing down your executioners. Rapidly as my arrangements were carried on, they were hastened still more by the eagerness with which Stanley sought to accelerate your doom. To this may be attributed the comparatively little execution done by our rifles. However I covered Stanley, and you were rescued. What more could we ask?"

"And I shall never forget your gallantry and friendship," said Ernest, warmly clasping Clinton's hand. "You have laid me under a debt to you which a life, even as long as that of Methuselah, will not suffice to repay."

"Pshaw! my dear fellow, say no more of it. You would have done exactly the same thing for me if you had had a chance. Apart from our friendship, it was my duty as a soldier, to attempt the rescue of a companion in arms, in circumstances like yours. But you have not told me how you came to be captured, or if you reached the mansion at all."

Ernest now, in turn, narrated the circumstances which had befallen him, since he and Clinton parted on the preceding evening; and though the speaker's voice more than once failed him, especially when alluding to his father's death, he was enabled to finish his tale in a connected manner.

"I sympathize with you—how truly you yourself are aware, dear Ernest," said Clinton, "but amid your grief you have the cheering consolation that your father died in peace with you, and that Edith has been saved from the arts of a designing villain. By the death of Stanley, moreover, all danger of further molestation for her, from that quarter, is at an end. At any rate she can seek the protection of Howe, which will be readily accorded to her."

In such conversation passed the time until the two companions reached the American camp, where Ernest found that he had been raised to the rank of captain, which rank he had held nominally since the death of his superior at the battle of Germantown. The congratulations of his friends welcomed him to his new office, and the commander-in-chief personally complimented him on his address and bravery.

One of the first inquiries of Ernest was after Stetson. Proceeding to the temporary hospital where the wounded dragoon had been, he met the nurse and asked after the prisoner.

"Lor, sir, that awful man whom you were to see yesterday!—is he the one your honor asks after!—for he raved so much, I has been so since yesterday morn. One of the horriest deaths, sir, I've seen for a long time—he was out of his head, sartain. Oh! if your honor had seen him clutch the bed clothes, and writhe about like a wounded worm, and start up in bed and call me all the awfullest words, looking at me with such a wild, strange look as almost made my hair stand on end—if your honor had heard all this it would have turned your blood cold. I've seen many a man die afore, but none ever died so hard. If all them Britishers are as wicked as he, I don't know what will become of 'em in the next world, or what would become of us here if they was only to beat General Washington, whom God bless and preserve from 'em!"

Our story draws to a close. The courser is in sight of the goal, the race is almost done. From the heat and labor of the day we gladly turn aside to retire from the field. A few words will dismiss us forever.

The trials which Edith and Ernest had undergone, and the loss they had sustained in Col. Harcourt's death, knit them closer than ever together, at the same time that their hearts were improved. There is nothing like sorrow to elevate the character, and in drinking of the bitter cup that had been allotted them by an all-wise Providence, they learnt more accurately than they ever would otherwise have known, the true tone of their own hearts. They meta few weeks after the death of Ernest's father, for the country, in the vicinity of the Brandywine, having now become quiet, Edith determined to return to the old homestead, and having obtained a passport from General Howe, left Philadelphia. Many were the tears that she shed on Ernest's bosom when they met, for thoughts of that fatal night when they last parted, crowded on her memory. Luckily she had not heard of Ernest's danger until after he had been rescued. The death of Stanley deeply affected her. But all these things had taken place before her mind, been occupied with the loss of her uncle, than they would have had under ordinary circumstances; while, even amid her sorrow, she derived a consolation from the reconciliation between Ernest and the deceased, and the blissful consciousness that her lover was yet all she had dreamed.

The will of Col. Harcourt had been drawn up, in the first burst of his anger against Ernest, and consequently excluded the rightful heir from all share in the estate, which was bequeathed to Edith without reserve. The sudden death of the testator prevented him from altering the provisions of the will; but Edith insisted that Ernest should take possession of the estate, declaring that under no circumstances, would she accept the devise. Ernest, however, was as decided in rejecting the gift, but at length the difference was adjusted, by Edith consenting to share them at the bride of her cousin. This interesting ceremony occurred about a year after the events we have just narrated; and lovely as Edith was at all times, she looked more than usually beautiful on the morning of that auspicious day. Trembling and sensitive she stood up before the altar, and pronounced those vows which gave her to her cousin in a closer and dearer relation; and when Ernest pressed her to his heart, and the memory of all they had suffered for each other rose up before her, she could restrain herself no longer, but burst into tears; yet they were tears of joy, not sorrow. Though they had passed through many trials, felicity crowned them at last—a felicity so perfect that they almost doubted, for a while, whether it could be real.

Ernest's marriage, however, did not withdraw him from the army. He remained a few weeks with his bride at the old mansion where they had first loved, and if hitherto they had spent many a happy hour loitering by the banks of the Brandywine, the felicity enjoyed as lovers was surpassed by that the wedded couple now experienced. At length, however, the husband was forced to tear himself from the arms of his bride, and hasten to the performance of his duties as a soldier. He remained in the army until after the capture of Yorktown, only occasionally solacing himself with a visit to his home, which was after a couple of years further enlivened by the presence of a lovely girl, which his wife presented him with. When, however, Cornwallis, with his army, surrendered to the allied arms, Ernest, now having attained the rank of lieutenant colonel, deeming the war virtually at an end, resigned his commission and turned his sword into a pruning hook, determined to spend the remainder of his days in the bosom of his family. Nor was it, until the lapse of many years, and after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, that he was induced again to appear on the public stage. Then, however, the wants of his country again required his aid, not now in the field, but the cabinet. His name may be found among the most eminent of those who filled the offices of his native state and of the nation.

Edith was equally lovely as a matron as when a bride. Years did not seem to impair the beauty of her countenance. Her winning smile, her soul-lit eye, the placid repose of her brow, and the sunny glow which characterised her conversation did not lose their power as time passed, but, if possible, became more endeared to her husband. He saw, too, in the lovely daughters who grew up around him, the self-same Edith whom he had known when a gay-hearted boy; while she recognized in the tall sons who sat around her table the counterparts of him who had won her heart even in childhood. And were they not happy? Ah! rarely in this world is it given to mortals to enjoy the unalloyed felicity which fell to the lot of Colonel Harcourt and his bride. They had quaffed deeply of the cup of bitterness, during that portion of their life we have undertaken to record, and now late, as if satisfied with what she had done, refilled the goblet and gave them to drink of happiness without stint.

Reader! if you have perused these chapters without seeing in them any deeper mission than the mere gratification of an idle hour, you have much misconstrued their import. It was not alone to wile away a summer afternoon that the writer undertook to narrate these eventsonce. If others do not perceive, in what he has penned, lessons of duty and forbearance—of others cannot read in those scenes and characters how erring is human judgment—if others fail to imbibe the great truth of charity to all men, but especially to those bound to us by ties of love and relationship,—then indeed has the author labored in vain, no matter how much he may have succeeded in other respects. A single word of thanks for having followed him so long is but a decent return for your patience. And so he drops the curtain.

From the Magazines.

PAULINE BUTLER.

A Tale.

FROM THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE, FOR AUGUST

CHAPTER I.

In an old-fashioned and venerable looking mansion, in one of the most deserted streets of Toulouse, sat a young man, of some eight-and-twenty or thirty years of age. His figure was tall, his eye was quick, and his whole air bespoke the soldier, as well as the dark and upcurled moustache that graced his upper lip. Beside him, on a sofa, a fair and lovely girl was seated, whose hands he held firmly clasped within his own. Both were silent and motionless, and evinced, in their attitude of anxious watching, a state of thrilling expectancy.

"Suddenly a slight noise was heard, and then more distinctly the wheels of a carriage at a distance. At the sound they both started, and the young girl, suddenly disengaging her hands, rose and darted with one bound to the window, and looked out with a wondering expression of hope and joy, and even fear, upon her beautiful and girlish face.

In a moment after, the carriage, instead of approaching, seemed to take another direction, and all was again silent. The young girl, disappointed, returned to her seat, and, sighing deeply, said—

"I was again wrong—this was not the carriage we wished for, Ferdinand; your mother will not come; she does not wish to see me."

He to whom these words were addressed, smiled, and, kissing her forehead, while he endeavored in vain to appear angry, said—

"Pauline, you are very silly."

The young girl looked silent, and then she said—

"Well, Ferdinand, would you like me to tell you a secret! There are times I wish your mother would not come—I am afraid of her, dear Ferdinand."

"Foolish child! have I not told you a hundred times of her goodness and indulgence!"

"Yes, for childish faults; but a marriage, Ferdinand, and a marriage without her consent."

"But do you forget she has forgiven, and is coming to us."

"It is just that I cannot believe—that the proud, rich, haughty Marquise de Livry, whose son might have won the best in the land, should come to see my face—

"Hold your tongue, Pauline," interrupted quickly the young man; when my mother has seen you, she will approve of my choice, I am sure."

"God grant it, Ferdinand. Your mother has such influence upon you, our whole happiness depends upon her opinion of me."

"Sweet one, do you think I should love you less!"

"No, no! never speak of that; but, Ferdinand, read to me again your mother's last letter, sending her pardon, and promise to come to us. I wish to hear it again, to be sure that it is quite true."

"If you wish it, Pauline, we will read it together."

So saying, M. de Livry opened his writing desk, and took out the precious letter, and putting his arm round the neck of his young wife, began to read the following ——

Beden, 15th July, 1836.

MY DEAR FERDINAND—Both your letters, written in June, found me at Baden, where I have been obliged to come for my health, greatly impaired since the death of your father, and, shall I confess it! since I heard of your marriage.

"You speak of coming with your wife to ask pardon, I am sure, my son, you are grieved at the sorrow you have caused me. There are occasions, however, wherein the fault you have committed—that of marrying a foreigner against the will of your family—however serious, would be excusable, particularly in the eyes of your mother."

On reaching this part of the letter, Monsieur and Madame de Livry stopped involuntarily and exchanged a look—but how different the expression of that look! Hers was that of cold fear, while hers was that of burning shame. After a moment, Ferdinand again began to read and read alone—

"Do not come to Paris. You will not find me there; but expect me at Toulouse the 10th of August at the latest, with best love to all three.

"Your affectionate mother,

"MARQUISE DE LIVRY."

"And this is the 10th of August," said Ferdinand, "and my mother is always so punctual, I am sure she will be here soon."

Then seeing that Pauline remained silent, while her eyes were full of tears, he pressed her in his arms, and said—

"Courage, my beloved. Remember my mother is ignorant of every thing; and very likely it is to that we owe her pardon; and do not forget that the Comtesse de Livry, innocent in the eyes of her husband, need not blush before any one."

"How generous you are, and how good," replied Pauline tenderly. "How can I ever prove my gratitude!"

"By loving me, dearest!"

At this instant the cracking of whips, and the roll of wheels, announced the arrival of the long-expected Marquise de Livry at the house of her ancestor, where her son had been residing some months.

At this critical moment, Ferdinand, who until now, had not experienced the extreme nervousness of his wife, felt his heart beat violently, and was obliged to stop repeatedly on his way down stairs to meet his mother, from the excess of his agitation.

The moment the Marquise saw her son, she threw herself into his arms, and for some moments was overpowered by her feelings, she could not speak. At last she said—

"And Pauline, where is Pauline!"

At the moment she perceived her daughter-in-law kneeling beside her, and trying to take one of her hands to kiss it. The Marquise lifted her up, affectionately saying—

"Is this the way you receive your mother! Kiss me, my child."

Poor Pauline, overcome by so much kindness, threw herself into her arms, and wept upon her bosom.

We will now request the three persons who have just been introduced to our readers, were seated quietly in a small drawing-room. The Marquise was placed between her son and daughter-in-law, keeping her eyes constantly fixed on the latter, whose beauty seemed more fascinating every moment. She overwhelmed her with questions, and did not give her time to answer one question, until she asked another.

"Pauline," said the old lady, "you are afraid of me—Ferdinand has told you that I am cross and proud. Naughty fellow! I am not astonished he has forgotten to tell you how I love children."

"Do not say a word, dear mother," said Ferdinand, hastily. "I know well that I have been sadly neglected."

"Ah!" replied his young wife, that was the very reason of my confusion when I saw you—knowing that I was the cause of this long separation."

"Fear of your mother, my child! But to begin. My son, tell me how many days have you been with me since you left the army, and that was some years ago. They are easily reckoned. A month in 1834, fifteen days in 1835, and then you never could get away quick enough. I now know the reason; but to hide your marriage from me."

As she said this, Ferdinand exchanged a rapid glance with Pauline, in which a close observer might have detected ill-concealed embarrassment; but recovering himself quickly, he replied with firmness—

"How could I tell you, my dear mother, without letting my father know too? and you know how strict he was always with me; and also his political prejudices were so strong, I could not venture to tell him that I, his only son, had married the daughter of an officer, in the service of one whom he called usurper."

"You seem to have forgotten, my son, that right or wrong, I always agreed in my husband's opinions; and people do not change at my age."

"I do not forget, my dear mother; but you are a woman, and I know that the heart of a woman is all that is tiny."

"Very well said, indeed; but still I must tease you, for I am not half satisfied yet; and now that we are all together, you will both of you tell me all the particulars of this event; for from your letters, I could learn nothing but that you were married."

This time, M. de Livry could not hide his displeasure, and, frowning angrily, he stammered out—

"Mother, if you will allow me, we shall talk of this another time. You have travelled a long way; you require rest—you must be tired!"

"Tired! not in the least, my dear," replied the Marquise, gaily. "I came by short stages. I slept at Alby, and dined at Saint Sulpice; so I am ready to hear your romantic tale. It will make me quite young again. It is long!"

"Oh, not in the least; and since you insist upon it ——

"Stop, stop; you have talked enough. It is now Pauline's turn. How are we to become acquainted, if we never speak to each other! Begin, my child; I am listening to you."

"Mother," began Ferdinand, driven to his last resource, "you see Pauline is so timid."

"The greater the reason to encourage her. Come, my child, begin."

Pauline looked at her husband; and upon a sign from him determined to speak.

"Madame la Marquise," murmured she in a low voice, "you know ——

"I know nothing," replied the inquisitive old lady. The young girl, suppressing a deep sigh by an effort, thus began—

"M. de Livry has already told you that I am of low birth. My father's family were farmers of La Marche, in Lorraine. At eighteen he himself enlisted; but, alas! madame, it was to serve in a cause against which M. de Livry fought. If it was wrong, in your opinion, do not blame me; I am innocent of it."

"Do not think me so unjust," said the Marquise gently.

"In 1814," continued Pauline, "my father was a lieutenant-colonel, and an officer of the 'legion d'honneur.' He wished to leave the service, and obtained a small pension. 1815 arrived, and with 1815 came the emperor. On learning the return of his benefactor, my father girded on his sword, and—I do not know how to tell you—he was one of the first to join Napoleon. What would you have him do! France was mad. Alas! the star of the great captain had set, and the life of the faithful soldier was lost on the same day. My mother, poor, broken hearted mother, my mother, bowed down with grief, soon followed him. Then, I, alone, was left, then obtained admission into the royal school of Saint Denis, through the interest of some of my father's friends. I have been happy, very happy, since I became like a dream. I had friends—I was happy. When I left it I was alone in the world—alone, I am wrong; I had an aunt; but she was as poor as myself, and we lived in the greatest poverty, when ——"

At this part of her story a deep blush spread over her face, and she seemed overwhelmed by some painful recollection.

"Well," cried the Marquise, with astonishment, "go on. When, you said."

The Comte de Livry, who had followed with evident emotion every word his wife uttered, now pale and agitated; but when he perceived that Pauline had vowed to speak, he became red, and cried with impetuosity—

"You see, mother, I was right to tell you that Pauline was timid. Why, I have not told you a hundred times of her goodness and indulgence!"

"Yes, for childish faults; but a marriage, Ferdinand, and a marriage without her consent."

"But do you forget she has forgiven, and is coming to us."

"It is just that I cannot believe—that the proud, rich, haughty Marquise de Livry, whose son might have won the best in the land, should come to see my face—

"Hold your tongue, Pauline," interrupted quickly the young man; when my mother has seen you, she will approve of my choice, I am sure."

"God grant it, Ferdinand. Your mother has such influence upon you, our whole happiness depends upon her opinion of me."

"Sweet one, do you think I should love you less!"

"No, no! never speak of that; but, Ferdinand, read to me again your mother's last letter, sending her pardon, and promise to come to us. I wish to hear it again, to be sure that it is quite true."

"If you wish it, Pauline, we will read it together."

So saying, M. de Livry opened his writing desk, and took out the precious letter, and putting his arm round the neck of his young wife, began to read the following ——

Beden, 15th July, 1836.

MY DEAR FERDINAND—Both your letters, written in June, found me at Baden, where I have been obliged to come for my health, greatly impaired since the death of your father, and, shall I confess it! since I heard of your marriage.

"You speak of coming with your wife to ask pardon, I am sure, my son, you are grieved at the sorrow you have caused me. There are occasions, however, wherein the fault you have committed—that of marrying a foreigner against the will of your family—however serious, would be excusable, particularly in the eyes of your mother."

On reaching this part of the letter, Monsieur and Madame de Livry stopped involuntarily and exchanged a look—but how different the expression of that look! Hers was that of cold fear, while hers was that of burning shame. After a moment, Ferdinand again began to read and read alone—

"Do not come to Paris. You will not find me there; but expect me at Toulouse the 10th of August at the latest, with best love to all three.

"Your affectionate mother,

"MARQUISE DE LIVRY."

"And this is the 10th of August," said Ferdinand, "and my mother is always so punctual, I am sure she will be here soon."

Then seeing that Pauline remained silent, while her eyes were full of tears, he pressed her in his arms, and said—

"Courage, my beloved. Remember my mother is ignorant of every thing; and very likely it is to that we owe her pardon; and do not forget that the Comtesse de Livry, innocent in the eyes of her husband, need not blush before any one."

"How generous you are, and how good," replied Pauline tenderly. "How can I ever prove my gratitude!"

"By loving me, dearest!"

At this instant the cracking of whips, and the roll of wheels, announced the arrival of the long-expected Marquise de Livry at the house of her ancestor, where her son had been residing some months.

At this critical moment, Ferdinand, who until now, had not experienced the extreme nervousness of his wife, felt his heart beat violently, and was obliged to stop repeatedly on his way down stairs to meet his mother, from the excess of his agitation.

The moment the Marquise saw her son, she threw herself into his arms, and for some moments was overpowered by her feelings, she could not speak. At last she said—

"And Pauline, where is Pauline!"

At the moment she perceived her daughter-in-law kneeling beside her, and trying to take one of her hands to kiss it. The Marquise lifted her up, affectionately saying—

"Is this the way you receive your mother! Kiss me, my child."

Poor Pauline, overcome by so much kindness, threw herself into her arms, and wept upon her bosom.

We will now request the three persons who have just been introduced to our readers, were seated quiet

"Your voice is quite changed, and you look as if you had been crying."

"Oh, no, no, said Pauline blushing deeply.

"Whatever it is, my child, I will not have you alone. Ferdinand can go with those ladies, while I remain with you."

"Thank you, ma'am—thank you," replied Pauline, impatiently. "I should be so sorry to prevent your going! The weather is charming. I think I should become really ill, if I did not use one you go to enjoy it."

"I agree with my wife," added Ferdinand, looking at Pauline coldly and steadily; "it is a sacrifice you should not—you could not, accept, to-day. Is it not so?"

"Ferdinand," said Pauline timidly, "I do not quite understand you. If you think my absence would be wrong—that I ought to go—if you wish it—if you insist upon it——"

"If I insist upon it?" interrupted M. de Livry, with bitterness. "You know I have never insisted upon any thing, Pauline; and it is not when you are ill I would begin."

"I know," said Pauline mildly, "you are always kind to me. Believe me, I did not mean to vex you."

"Mother," said Ferdinand coldly, "we need not be uneasy about leaving Pauline; her illness is not very alarming—and the ladies are waiting."

"You really wish I should leave you?" said the Marquise, holding out her hand to Pauline.

"I wish it," replied Pauline, with an indefinable expression;—"I entreat it."

"Take good care of yourself, love, in our absence, and be quite well on our return."

Ferdinand, contrary to his custom, left the room without speaking to her, though evidently not without a struggle. Pauline looked at him supplicatingly, and, when the door was shut, she watched at the window until they drove away, and then falling on her knees, said:—

"God forgive me for having deceived them."

At that moment twelve o'clock struck, and her door opened slowly and cautiously.

CHAPTER IV.

The person who entered the room was Madame de Melcourt, of whom the reader already knows a little.

"I watched for your husband's going out, dear Pauline; but tell me, how you feel?"

"I do not know," replied Madame de Livry; who, on having the door open, had jumped up suddenly. "My poor head is wild. I am so glad you have come to me. Sit near me, Fanny, and do not leave me."

"Poor Pauline!—what an event!"

"Is it not something unheard of,—is it not something too dreadful? It is a miracle how I supported the presence of that man with so much firmness."

"But the papers—the official letters, all announced his death."

"If I had not had the most convincing proofs of it, do you think I should ever have married?"

"I see the difficulty of your position, if M. de Livry should know."

"He know! Do not make me desperate, Fanny;—do not make me lose the little reason I have."

"What did he say in the note I gave you yesterday evening?"

"Oh, the note!—I burned it immediately, afraid Ferdinand should see it. It was very short. He should see me to-day. He knows there was an extraordinary pleasure for the country,—that I must avoid joining it, but send my husband. There was also a postscript, in which he said I ran no risk in seeing him, as he had changed his name, and his visit would come as one of civility. You see, Fanny, I have done all. But what can he want with me? Has he not already done me mischief enough?"

"Then you are resolved to see him."

"Me! Oh, no! That is the reason I wrote to you this morning; I reckoned upon your friendship, Fanny."

"What can I do for you?"

"Receive him instead of me."

"What shall I say to him?"

"Listen! Notwithstanding all they say, I believe him to be an honest man,—I will in his believe it, at least. Tell him that he has ruined me once, and that God has saved me, but that if Ferdinand knew he still lived, happiness for me would be for ever gone, and I could only die. Tell him—but Fanny, you are a woman,—you are kind—you pity me—you love me. Tell him all that can move him—all that can touch his heart. Ask for mercy, in my name; for, when Ferdinand's happiness, perhaps his life, depends on it, I must not be proud."

"Dear Pauline, be calm; I will try to have courage."

At this moment there was a loud knock at the hall door; Madame de Livry became pale as death, the blow of the knocker seemed to have smote her heart. She remained some seconds thus, her eye fixed—her mouth open. Madame de Melcourt was terrified.

"Stay, Pauline," said she; "you had better receive him yourself. He will see how you suffer, and sincerely will pity you."

"Oh, no!" cried Madame de Livry, "not till I am forced. Nothing but force, Fanny, could make me see that man."

A servant entered and said:—

"M. de Fontenoy wishes to know if he can see Madame de Livry?"

"Show him up stairs," said Pauline, in a voice scarcely articulate, and as the servant left the room, she threw herself into Madame de Melcourt's arms.

"Fanny—my own Fanny," said she, overpowered, "I have no hope but in you; learn what brings him here, and—if it be possible that he loves me still—conjure him in the name of that love to leave this place."

"He is coming up stairs—I hear him," replied Madame de Melcourt, quickly.

Pauline uttered a faint cry, and fled.

At the same moment the servant announced M. de Fontenay. He did not seem surprised at not finding Pauline in the room when he entered, being well accustomed to conceal all his emotions. But when Madame de Melcourt muttered something about Pauline's serious illness, she had begged her to receive him in her stead, he replied in his usual sarcastic manner:—

"At any other time I should be delighted to play the gallant, and tell you I was most happy to see you in the place of Madame de Livry, but to-day I am obliged to be candid,—and it is Madame de Livry I must speak with."

The tone in which he said this, disconcerted Madame de Melcourt for a moment, but she remembered Pauline's position, and replied with dignity:—

"Monsieur de Fontenay, or rather Monsieur D'Herbanne,—for before me you may laid aside your assumed name),—can you know to what danger you expose Madame de Livry, by coming to her house?"

He shrugged his shoulders slightly, and replied in the coolest manner:—

"Madame de Melcourt, or rather, Fanny Melville,—for before me you may resume your name,—can you tell me what has become of Lord F——th, the handsome attendant at the opera?"

She to whom this question was addressed did not seem in the least embarrassed, but answered smartly:—

"Lord F——th has got a high appointment in India, but before going, married a person of a thousand a year, on a person who was most sincerely attached to him. But to return to Pauline, will you tell me frankly the meaning of your visit?"

"And," added the sneering M. de Fontenay, "the person in whom Lord F—— took such interest, did she not speak of a husband she had left—there—somewhere—on the Continent? Why did she not return to him?"

"It was what she was about to do, when a misfortune prevented her."

"What?"

"Her poor husband."

"Well?"

"He died."

"Then there really was such a person?"

"Sir?"

"Do not be angry. You ask me questions—I ask you others;—is there any harm in that?"

"Then you do not intend to answer me?"

"Certainly not."

"One word at least—yes or no;—would you ruin Pauline?"

"No;—that is to say, if I see her, and she will do what I want. I love Pauline to-morrow, and she shall never see me again."

"If she refuse?"

"She will not refuse, madame;—and that door, to which you turn so uneasily, which appears to be not quite close, I venture to say will open immediately."

Scarcely had he pronounced the last words when the door was opened violently, and Pauline entered, pale, but dignified.

"You are right, sir. I am here."

"I did not know," replied D'Herbanne, bowing lowly, "I was so good a prophet."

"And I did not know you were so cruel." Then turning to Madame de Melcourt, she said:—

"Thank you, dear Fanny, for all your affection. You are a good and faithful friend."

Madame de Melcourt took Pauline's hand, and pressed it warmly, and then turning to the man who had treated her so contemptuously, she said proudly:—

"Monsieur D'Herbanne, I thought you once a gentleman," and left the room.

Whether these words annoyed him, or that it is impossible for a man who has ever tenderly loved a woman, to meet her again with indifference, though he no longer loves her, I know not, but D'Herbanne had lost all his firmness, and Pauline was obliged to break the silence.

"Well, sir, what do you want with me?"

"Pauline," stammered he, in a stifled voice.

"To all the world, and more particularly to you, sir, I am Madame de Livry. May I beg you to remember it."

"Madame de Livry,—be it so,—but believe me, it is not my fault that you have not another name; and when you broke, by your flight, the ties that united us, I was on the sea."

"Sir, if I had taken your name, I should have responded it, as I do now the one I bear. But speak; you are I wait."

"I beg your pardon. If I have not been so prompt to explain myself as you are impatient to hear me, think of what I must feel, and feel deeply."

"Mercy!—have mercy, and tell me at once the reason of your visit."

"I cannot tell you without making allusions to circumstances which you have forbidden me to mention to you."

"I did not forbid you, sir; I begged you to spare me, if you have not generously consented to do so, go on."

"No, madame, since you require it, I will not speak of myself. I can sacrifice myself to satisfy you; but I cannot give up my interest in the only thing that remains to me in the world. You must feel I wish to speak of my son."

And, as Madame de Livry bent her head, and hid her face in her hands, he continued:—"You should never have seen me, madame—I should never have come to disturb your happiness, except for the future welfare of my boy."

Pauline looked up, and now, less severely than before, said:—

"If it was love for your son that brought you, I have done you wrong,—forgive me. The child is happy, thank God! and his future welfare provided for by a secret deed, made by M. de Livry, acknowledging him when he married me; consequently, he is the legitimate inheritor of his property and his name."

"His name!" cried D'Herbanne, impetuously. "What to it you say? What right had you to deprive him of mine? That you should dispose of yourself I can well conceive, as all the English papers believed the report of my death,—and you were free; but my son—by what power have you disposed of him? He belongs to me, madame, and I come to demand him!"

Pauline remained stupified for some instants after those terrible words, and then cried in a voice scarcely articulate:—

"To demand him! You come to demand my son!"

"Yes, madame," replied D'Herbanne, who had regained all his coolness, "my son!"

"But you have not understood what I told you," said the unhappy mother. "Paul is the son of M. de Livry, who has acknowledged him, and given him his name and his fortune."

"M. de Livry can do as he pleases, but I am not bound by his acts. His rights, which are but those of legal fiction, can never interfere with the rights of blood."

"Are you in earnest? Do you forget that the birth of that child you could have acknowledged, and yet did not?"

"You did not give me time. Why did you leave me? Why did you conceal yourself so in London, that I could not find you?"

"Why did I leave you! You know well. Because I never was with you, except as a victim, and almost a prisoner. The bread of infamy would have killed my son."

"A happy chance has repaired my wrong towards you,—let me now repair those against him."

"What, sir! You think that your son could one day thank you for dishonoring his mother; for you are not ignorant of my position in M. de Livry's family. They believe we have been married five years; they believe Paul to be the fruit of that union;—Give him to you, sir—you, whose real name might be known at any moment! To to tell all—to confess all! I will not speak of the cruelty of ruining a woman who has never injured you. But, what interest can you have in doing so? Do not speak to me of your love—I do not believe in it. Do not speak to me of your son, for it is to him you are the most cruel. You would take him from a certain position, to give him, instead, a poor, uncertain, miserable existence! 'Tis frightful! Excuse yourself, if you can, sir."

"I can do so with one word. In claiming my child, I can secure more to him than I take from him."

"Explain yourself clearly, sir; you see that I am in torture."

"As clearly as I can, madame; like you, I wish to have it ended. You have often heard me speak of an uncle at Bayonne, who educated me——"

"Yes, yes."

"My uncle is enormously rich, and I should be his heir, but unfortunately he is prejudiced against me, and he hesitates to give me his fortune, to disagree, as he says I did my own; and it was only on revealing the existence of my son, but concealing the name of his mother, that he has consented to make his will. This arrangement suits all; it satisfies his scruples, and my interest. My son will be my uncle's heir, but, until his majority, I shall receive his income."

"I understand, sir—your paternal love is still a speculation."

"Madame——"

"But I will not be an accomplice in this, as I have been in many others. Never—never."

"Here there was a silence of some instants. Pauline, a prey to violent excitement, had thrown herself into an arm-chair, at the end of the room, and D'Herbanne, severely suffering by her last words, seemed about to lose his habitual coolness, but, quickly regaining command over himself, he approached Madame de Livry, and settling upon her his steady and penetrating look, he pronounced, with quiet emphasis, the following words:—

"Pauline, mind what you are about—we change places. You speak to me as if it was I that was in your power. Understand a little better your position. This is what I require of you—and have more the manner of the school where my son is: with that, I shall go and get him, and all shall be ended. You see I wish to avoid all scandal. You can make fitting excuses to account for the child's absence, and the position you fear so much to lose."

"Sir," interrupted Pauline, quickly, "do you still talk to me of my position—of my honor? I think no more of either. It is no longer Madame de Livry who speaks to you, it is an unhappy mother. Remember, I have rights as sacred as yours,—leave me my son—leave me my son!"

It was with heart-rending earnestness that Pauline said these words, at the same time taking hold of D'Herbanne's hands, and pressing them gently. He appeared moved,—it was but for a moment. He disengaged his hands coldly, and moved away.

"I have but one thing to reply to you. To take this child to my uncle, I have left Navarre, where I was safe. I came to France, where, at any moment, I may be arrested on an agent of Don Carlos. I shall leave Toulouse to-morrow morning. You are I have no time to lose. If, in the course of the day, I do not receive the letter I have asked, I shall be obliged to come this evening, and as M. de Livry. We shall see if he will dare refuse it me."

"Oh, one or other must fall!" cried Pauline, rising from her chair, and running to D'Herbanne; but ere she was at the door, which was open. Bowing respectfully to Madame de Livry, he said in a low but firm voice:—

"You still have some hours to deliberate."

A moment after, he was gone, leaving poor Pauline nearly fainting. When she began to recover a little, she thought she must have had a frightful dream; but soon she remembered the dreadful street contained in those words, "This evening I will come and demand my son of M. de Livry." She knew that if M. de Livry was aware that Ferdinand lived, and which, such a claim on her, he would never rest until one or other had fallen in a duel. She had no choice—she must give up her son—and into what hands! Suddenly a happy thought appeared to strike her, for she rushed to the table, and began writing with great rapidity:—

"Sir,—I consent to part with my son, but on one condition. I know your uncle is a gentleman, and I do not fear to entrust to him my secret——"

The door opened suddenly, and the Marquise entered, leaning on Ferdinand's arm. Pauline started, and shading her writing-box hastily, hid the note in her bosom.

CHAPTER V.

The place which Pauline occupied in a dark corner of the room made her suppose she had escaped the observation of her husband, and running gaily to the Marquise, said,

"Back already. I am so glad."

"We were a short way," replied La Marquise, "Ferdinand was so anxious to return on your account. How are you now?"

"Much better."

"I am glad to hear it. Do you know the news I received on my return? My friend, Madame de Lostange, whose letter you read yesterday, has arrived at Toulouse on her way to Bayonne, about the affairs I told you of."

"Heavens!" murmured Pauline, turning deadly pale.

"She begs me to come see her, continued the Marquise; "and I have a favor to ask you, my child. Madame de Lostange is my dearest friend; she remains but two days at Toulouse to rest—Can we let her remain at a hotel?"

"You must, of course, mother, ask her to come to us."

"And that your invitation may not be refused, would it not be well that one of you should come with me?"

"I think so too; and since Pauline is so much better she will go with you."

"Excuse me," said Pauline; "but I have something to do."

"Oh," said M. de Livry, in the most natural manner, "perhaps a letter begun; it may be the same you were writing when we came in; but it will be time enough when you return."

"Ferdinand," murmured Pauline trembingly.

"Madame," added Ferdinand, in a low voice, "accompany my mother; and on your return I must beg a moment's conversation with you."

Pauline looked timidly at her husband; but though he was pale she could not discover any appearance of anger. She gave her arm to the Marquise, and went out with her.

Left to himself, M. de Livry commenced walking up and down the room in a state of great agitation. He had not done so more than three or four times, when he was suddenly stopped by Clodion, who entered at the moment looking more sombre, more morose, and more bloodthirsty than ever.

"What do you want?" said Ferdinand, with a disagreeable presentiment.

"My dear fellow," said he, putting his finger on his lips mysteriously, "while you were out, there happened such things."

"What things? Speak—go on—can't you speak, man?"

"Let me recover myself a little, I am wretched. Your mother was quite right when she advised me not to marry Madame de Melcourt. She is an arrant flirt."

"You have, then, fresh cause for anger."

"Have I?—indeed, have I?" replied Clodion, with a tragical air. "You will not say now that I am blinded by jealousy. When I left you, this morning, I went to the hotel where Madame de Melcourt stops. I wished to see her—to speak to her—to reproach her for her deceitful conduct. I only saw her maid, who told me she had a headache. You know what a headache means with ladies."

"Well, and then."

"And then—nothing, but suspecting it to be an excuse, I went to a friend's just opposite and remained there watching. I had not been there above three quarters of an hour, when I saw my lady go out dressed most coquettishly. Her headache did not last long it appears.

"You followed her."

"Exactly so; but guess the road she took."

"What do I care?"

"The road to your house, my dear fellow—that is the fun of it. I was following her to ask an explanation of her conduct, when I saw that detestable M. de Fontenay."

"M. de Fontenay!"

"Himself. He turned the corner of the street, which changed my intention; and I turned back to meet another of my friends, and had scarcely time to run to the window when I saw him enter your house."

"My house!"

"Are you not indignant! but who did he come for but Madame de Melcourt, as you, your wife, and your mother were all out: it was a meeting arranged between them."

"This is too much! This man had the audacity——"

"Thanks! thanks! my dear fellow. I knew well your friendship for me would make you take it up warmly."

"Go on then," interrupted M. de Livry, with vehemence. "do you not see I wait the end of your story. You remained watching them?"

"Until Madame de Melcourt went out."

"She went out with M. de Fontenay."

"Not at all; she went out alone."

"But he—he remained until then?"

"Faith, I do not know. I was more interested in Madame de Melcourt than him, and I hurried after her. She turned her head at the sound of my steps, and to my look of indignation she returned a good morning, 'good morning, I am in a great hurry,' and walked on quickly."

Ferdinand remained a moment silent, and then said, "Where does M. de Fontenay stop?"

"At the Hotel de France."

"I will go to him."

"As my friend?"

"Without doubt."

"What is the matter with you, Ferdinand, you are so pale? Nothing, nothing. Listen Clodion; there is not perhaps in all this, either fault or crime, if her honor be touched, be patient; every thing will be arranged as it ought to be; but in the mean time not a word of your jealousy to a human being, and above all to Madame de Melcourt. Promise it to me."

"Then you will tell me when I ought to feel angry."

"Yes."

"Well then, I promise."

"Hush! here is Pauline."

Pauline had just returned, after leaving her mother-in-law at Madame de Lostange who had declined their hospitality. On perceiving her husband and cousin apparently in earnest conversation, she was about to leave the room, but Ferdinand made a sign to her to remain. Clodion, having nothing more to say, rose to take leave, and pressing Ferdinand's hand, said in a low voice, "I will go and look at my swords and pistols; nobody can tell what may happen."

When M. de Livry found himself alone with his wife, he no longer concealed his passion. "Now, madame," said he, in a ferocious manner, "it is time to give me the explanation I demanded of you."

"An explanation upon what subject?" stammered Pauline; still more confounded than frightened at language to which she was unaccustomed.

"Upon what subject!" replied the count, with irony. "You are quite right, for there are several; but I must hear all—the letter that was given to you yesterday evening, the visits you received this morning, and the letter you were writing when I came in; you see I know them all; do not attempt to deny it, madame, but excuse yourself, if you can."

Pauline looked steadily at her husband, and then replied gently: "I will deny nothing; to deny would be to lie: and I see you are well informed. You spy then after my actions, Ferdinand: you have no longer confidence in me."

"Ah!" replied Ferdinand, shaken by the coolness with which Pauline replied to him, "the time is ill chosen to reproach me; it is your justification that I expect, not mine. Excuse yourself for God's sake; for I love you so much I can believe you still. Do you acknowledge that Madame de Melcourt gave you a note yesterday evening from M. de Fontenay?"

"I acknowledge it."

"And that note asked an interview for this morning?"

"It is true."

"And M. de Fontenay came; and your meeting was interrupted by some circumstance of which I am ignorant; and you were writing to him what you had wished to say. Show me that letter, madame. Show it to me."

"I have not that letter—I feared you might ask me for it, and I tore it."

"You tore it?"

"Believe me, I did you good service in doing so."

"What was in the letter?"

"Nothing to blush for; but nothing you can know. I have no more to say."

"Very well, madame, M. de Fontenay will be less discreet than you;" and in speaking thus Ferdinand walked towards the door.

"Where are you going?" stammered Pauline trembingly, and placing herself before him.

"I am going to ask this man a second period he knew you, and by what right he dares to write to you. I still respect you enough to believe that he did not see you yesterday for the first time."

"Ferdinand," cried the unhappy Pauline, catching her husband by the arm, if you have any love or pity for me you will not go to M. de Fontenay's house. Listen to me; I wish it. What! You took me when I was lower than I ever could have been, and raised me higher than I ever could have hoped;—you have elevated me in the eyes of the world, and in mine own;—and you can believe that I deceive you; if I were capable of it there are not words to express my infamy."

"That I should doubt you," replied Ferdinand, "the strongest evidence was necessary. Great as is my love, I am not blind. How can I explain the note—the interview—the letter, when you cannot explain it yourself. I have no greater wish than to believe you innocent. Give me one proof, but one proof, if not for you at least for me."

"Alas!" replied Pauline, sorrowfully shaking her head, "I am obliged to be silent. My justification would be worse than my silence; but listen to me. In you remember one day, when refusing your hand for the tenth time, I said to you: 'Ferdinand, I would be yours, if in the moment of our union we could forget the past'—but I have the past, the terrible past, against me, which will follow us like a phantom to our graves—you will be jealous some day, and then the remembrance of my fault will rise magnified before me. Doubts, suspicions, you're suspicions, Ferdinand, I will never marry you! and then you throw yourself at my feet; and do you remember what you said?"

"It appears I have forgotten it, Ferdinand: let me remind you of it. You said: 'Pauline, you are right, no man should promise more than he can perform; it is possible I may be jealous, but if ever I am unhappy enough to suspect—and enough to believe you guilty—when appearances are against you, do not justify yourself, but hold out your hand to me and say—I swear before God I love you, and am innocent.' Pauline I will lay on my knees and ask pardon." Ferdinand, it was on the faith of that promise I consented to become your wife. The moment I long feared and that you foresaw is come: our love can never go through a severer trial. Ferdinand, here is my hand, and I swear to you that I love you and am innocent."

As she spoke thus, an air of nobleness and beauty almost angelic clothed her features, and her every word bore the impress of truth. Ferdinand, moved to tears, fell at her feet, crying—

"Pauline! my life! my love! can you forgive me?"

Madame de Livry held out her hand to him in token of forgiveness, which he took and covered with kisses, while she murmured hoarsely:—

"His mercy be praised! I may yet be happy."

In her ecstasy as a wife, Pauline forgot she was a mother, and that the day, which already drew towards its close, could not end without her relinquishing to M. de Fontenay a blessing still dearer to a woman that loose itself.

CHAPTER VI.

"The sun was setting in full glory and majesty behind the church of St. Sernin, when Pauline, veiled as a woman, wrapped in a large shawl, and carefully veiled, entered the church, and almost immediately quitted it, traversed hastily but timidly various streets, at last stopped before a handsome house, looked behind her once to assure herself she was unobserved, entered quickly the hotel, and asked, in a voice scarcely audible, for M. de Fontenay.

"M. de Fontenay is gone out," replied the porter.

"Out!" replied the unknown, who was obliged to lean against the wall to prevent herself falling.

"Yes, madame; but if you would wish to wait——"

"I will wait! oh yes, I will wait!"

A servant passing at this moment, the porter desired him to show the young lady to No. 4, the sitting-room of M. de Fontenay.

The unknown had waited more than half an hour before M. de Fontenay entered, when, giving utterance to a faint cry of joy, she rose from her seat. M. de Fontenay hastened to her, saying—

"Madame, may I know——"

But scarcely had he spoken when the veil was raised, and a voice, already well known to him, said—

"It is I, sir."

The voice, is it necessary to say, was that of Madame de Livry.

The old lover of Pauline remained opposite to her for some seconds in a kind of stupor.

"You here, madame!" stammered he. "You in my house, when I scarcely hoped for a letter!"

"I did not wish to write to you," interrupted Pauline with a manner so unlike that of her husband, so different. Can you insure our not being interrupted? You know to what I expose myself in thus coming to your house."

"M. de Fontenay, or rather M. D'Herbanne, ran to the door and bolted it.

"And that door!" said Pauline, pointing to one opposite.

"Opens into a room also occupied by me."

"And that room has another!"

"One only into the garden, which has been fastened up."

"My God!" said Pauline, covering her face with her hands.

"Be calm, madame, you run no danger."

"You see, sir, how the step I have taken affects me; but it was necessary."

"I see in it a proof of confidence of which I am proud, but I repeat, a letter would have been sufficient."

"No, no; a letter might fall into the hands of a stranger, and then I was lost—that letter might make no impression upon you, whilst, in coming myself, I hope you will not go on as I left you. If I long thought of it, but I know it was impossible; for in a letter I could not have told you all I have suffered; I could not have told you how your unexpected presence has thrown trouble into my home and despair into my heart."

"How, Madame! Does your husband then, know—"

"Except your name, he knows all. He watches me—the servants have told him. I do not like to believe it, but still the note Madame de Melcourt gave me—your visit in his absence—nothing has escaped him; and it is a miracle how I could excuse myself in his eyes without telling him the truth."

D'Herbanne gazed for some minutes on her, who might be called his victim, with a feeling of compassion which surprised even himself.

"But sooner or later you must tell him."

"Never—never!" replied Pauline with violence; "and it is for that I have come here in secret like a guilty woman. I have deceived my mother-in-law, my servants—who believe me at this moment at church, and in prayer. Listen to me, sir."

"I listen, madame, and am ready to take any precautions which this meeting; but you must not forget that it is absolutely necessary that I depart to-morrow with my son."

Pauline cast upon him the supplicating look of a wretched mother; then, seeing he turned away his head, she said, in a broken voice—

"Oh! but you are cruel. You take advantage of my position. You know I cannot avow to my husband that you still exist, that I have seen you, without causing between you a frightful meeting. You know all that; and, instead of compassion for me——But perhaps you wish my ruin!"

"No, madame," answered D'Herbanne coldly; "I have not the least wish to be known to M. de Livry."

"Well, accept, then, my proposition; it is the only way to satisfy all parties."

"Explain yourself."

"You demand my son, to take him to your uncle!"

"Exactly so."

"Your uncle intends to educate him and make him his heir?"

"To educate him perhaps; but as to the inheritance, he has solemnly promised that."

"Well, sir, Bayonne is a short journey, go and tell your uncle my secret, and entreat him to come here. His name is not the same as yours. I will prepare M. de Livry to expect him as a relative of mine, who, on the condition of being allowed to stay, will provide for our child."

Our child! It was the first time Madame de Livry called him my child, it showed how necessary she thought it to bribe the man who stumbled opposite to her said and inflexible as a judge.

"On this condition, and, above all, that your uncle should not, my son are alive, I—ah!—it is dreadful to say it—I can part with my son. You cannot ask more if you have a moment of humanity left."

"Your plan is impossible," replied D'Herbanne.

"Impossible!" repeated vehemently the unhappy mother. "Why impossible?"

"Because my uncle is dangerously ill, and could not come to Toulouse."

"Let him write, then," said Pauline, eagerly; "a letter will do—yes, a letter will be better; and M. de Livry himself will take his nephew to him. I promise you that, by all that is sacred."

"But in the meantime," replied the inexorable D'Herbanne, "my uncle might die, and then all would be lost."

"For you," replied Madame de Livry, bitterly.

"And for my son, also. I tell you, madame, there is but one thing to do—that is what I have already told you. You will find every thing have necessary to write with; two lines to the master of the school where you have placed my boy, in your writing, and I go, never to put foot again while I live in Toulouse. As to you, you can easily justify yourself in the eyes of the world, and also of your husband."

At this moment, some one knocked at the door. Pauline joined her hands, and murmured in a low voice—

"Do not open it—do not open it."

"Do not be alarmed," replied D'Herbanne; "it is somebody who has mistaken the room, for I do not expect any one."

Another knock.

"Who is there?" said D'Herbanne.

A voice replied from the outside—a voice that was felt at the bottom of Pauline's heart, said—

"The Count de Livry."

"My husband!" cried Pauline, shaken by the coolness with which Pauline replied to him, "the time is ill chosen to reproach me; it is your justification that I expect, not mine. Excuse yourself for God's sake; for I love you so much I can believe you still. Do you acknowledge that Madame de Melcourt gave you a note yesterday evening from M. de Fontenay?"

"I acknowledge it."

"And that note asked an interview for this morning?"

"It is true."

"And M. de Fontenay came; and your meeting was interrupted by some circumstance of which I am ignorant; and you were writing to him what you had wished to say. Show me that letter, madame. Show it to me."

"I have not that letter—I feared you might ask me for it, and I tore it."

"You tore it?"

"Believe me, I did you good service in doing so."

"What was in the letter?"

"Nothing to blush for; but nothing you can know. I have no more to say."

"Very well, madame, M. de Fontenay will be less discreet than you;" and in speaking thus Ferdinand walked towards the door.

"Where are you going?" stammered Pauline trembingly, and placing herself before him.

"I am going to ask this man a second period he knew you, and by what right he dares to write to you. I still respect you enough to believe that he did not see you yesterday for the first time."

"Ferdinand," cried the unhappy Pauline, catching her husband by the arm, if you have any love or pity for me you will not go to M. de Fontenay's house. Listen to me; I wish it. What! You took me when I was lower than I ever could have been, and raised me higher than I ever could have hoped;—you have elevated me in the eyes of the world, and in mine own;—and you can believe that I deceive you; if I were capable of it there are not words to express my infamy."

"That I should doubt you," replied Ferdinand, "the strongest evidence was necessary. Great as is my love, I am not blind. How can I explain the note—the interview—the letter, when you cannot explain it yourself. I have no greater wish than to believe you innocent. Give me one proof, but one proof, if not for you at least for me."

"Alas!" replied Pauline, sorrowfully shaking her head, "I am obliged to be silent. My justification would be worse than my silence; but listen to me. In you remember one day, when refusing your hand for the tenth time, I said to you: 'Ferdinand, I would be yours, if in the moment of our union we could forget the past'—but I have the past, the terrible past, against me, which will follow us like a phantom to our graves—you will be jealous some day, and then the remembrance of my fault will rise magnified before me. Doubts, suspicions, you're suspicions, Ferdinand, I will never marry you! and then you throw yourself at my feet; and do you remember what you said?"

"It appears I have forgotten it, Ferdinand: let me remind you of it. You said: 'Pauline, you are right, no man should promise more than he can perform; it is possible I may be jealous, but if ever I am unhappy enough to suspect—and enough to believe you guilty—when appearances are against you, do not justify yourself, but hold out your hand to me and say—I swear before God I love you, and am innocent.' Pauline I will lay on my knees and ask pardon." Ferdinand, it was on the faith of that promise I consented to become your wife. The moment I long feared and that you foresaw is come: our love can never go through a severer trial. Ferdinand, here is my hand, and I swear to you that I love you and am innocent."

As she spoke thus, an air of nobleness and beauty almost angelic clothed her features, and her every word bore the impress of truth. Ferdinand, moved to tears, fell at her feet, crying—

"Pauline! my life! my love! can you forgive me?"

Madame de Livry held out her hand to him in token of forgiveness, which he took and covered with kisses, while she murmured hoarsely:—

"His mercy be praised! I may yet be happy."

In her ecstasy as a wife, Pauline forgot she was a mother, and that the day, which already drew towards its close, could not end without her relinquishing to M. de Fontenay a blessing still dearer to a woman that loose itself.

CHAPTER VI.

"The sun was setting in full glory and majesty behind the church of St. Sernin, when Pauline, veiled as a woman, wrapped in a large shawl, and carefully veiled, entered the church, and almost immediately quitted it, traversed hastily but timidly various streets, at last stopped before a handsome house, looked behind her once to assure herself she was unobserved, entered quickly the hotel, and asked, in a voice scarcely audible, for M. de Fontenay.

"M. de Fontenay is gone out," replied the porter.

"Out!" replied the unknown, who was obliged to lean against the wall to prevent herself falling.

"Yes, madame; but if you would wish to wait——"

"I will wait! oh yes, I will wait!"

A servant passing at this moment, the porter desired him to show the young lady to No. 4, the sitting-room of M. de Fontenay.

The unknown had waited more than half an hour before M. de Fontenay entered, when, giving utterance to a faint cry of joy, she rose from her seat. M. de Fontenay hastened to her, saying—

"Madame, may I know——"

But scarcely had he spoken when the veil was raised, and a voice, already well known to him, said—

"It is I, sir."

The voice, is it necessary to say, was that of Madame de Livry.

The old lover of Pauline remained opposite to her for some seconds in a kind of stupor.

"You here, madame!" stammered he. "You in my house, when I scarcely hoped for a letter!"

"I did not wish to write to you," interrupted Pauline with a manner so unlike that of her husband, so different. Can you insure our not being interrupted? You know to what I expose myself in thus coming to your house."

"M. de Fontenay, or rather M. D'Herbanne, ran to the door and bolted it.

"And that door!" said Pauline, pointing to one opposite.

"Opens into a room also occupied by me."

"And that room has another!"

"One only into the garden, which has been fastened up."

"My God!" said Pauline, covering her face with her hands.

"Be calm, madame, you run no danger."

"You see, sir, how the step I have taken affects me; but it was necessary."

"I see in it a proof of confidence of which I am proud, but I repeat, a letter would have been sufficient."

"No, no; a letter might fall into the hands of a stranger, and then I was lost—that letter might make no impression upon you, whilst, in coming myself, I hope you will not go on as I left you. If I long thought of it, but I know it was impossible; for in a letter I could not have told you all I have suffered; I could not have told you how your unexpected presence has thrown trouble into my home and despair into my heart."

"How, Madame! Does your husband then, know—"

"Except your name, he knows all. He watches me—the servants have told him. I do not like to believe it, but still the note Madame de Melcourt gave me—your visit in his absence—nothing has escaped him; and it is a miracle how I could excuse myself in his eyes without telling him the truth."

D'Herbanne gazed for some minutes on her, who might be called his victim, with a feeling of compassion which surprised even himself.

"But sooner or later you must tell him."

"Never—never!" replied Pauline with violence; "and it is for that I have come here in secret like a guilty woman. I have deceived my mother-in-law, my servants—who believe me at this moment at church, and in prayer. Listen to me, sir."

"I listen, madame, and am ready to take any precautions which this meeting; but you must not forget that it is absolutely necessary that I depart to-morrow with my son."

Pauline cast upon him the supplicating look of a wretched mother; then, seeing he turned away his head, she said, in a broken voice—

"Oh! but you are cruel. You take advantage of my position. You know I cannot avow to my husband that you still exist, that I have seen you, without causing between you a frightful meeting. You know all that; and, instead of compassion for me——But perhaps you wish my ruin!"

"No, madame," answered D'Herbanne coldly; "I have not the least wish to be known to M. de Livry."

"Well, accept, then, my proposition; it is the only way to satisfy all parties."

"Explain yourself."

"You demand my son, to take him to your uncle!"

"Exactly so."

"Your uncle intends to educate him and make him his heir!"

"To educate him perhaps; but as to the inheritance, he has solemnly promised that."

"Well, sir, Bayonne is a short journey, go and tell your uncle my secret, and entreat him to come here. His name is not the same as yours. I will prepare M. de Livry to expect him as a relative of mine, who, on the condition of being allowed to stay, will provide for our child."

"Be it so. The report which announced D'Herbanne's death was untrue. He is alive. He is in the house we now are. I came hither to implore him to leave me my child."

"What! D'Herbanne!" cried Ferdinand; "that man—he still lives! and you, Pauline, you are not deceiving me! you could not do so. What have I said!—what have I done! Can you forgive me!"

"Yes, Ferdinand, I forgive you, and I love you, and I forgive all that is past;" and as she spoke she fell into his arms.

"And now," said Ferdinand, endeavoring to tear himself from her embrace, "my part begins."

As he spoke, the Marquise entered the room.

"I said," cried Pauline, "your mother should be my judge."

"Ferdinand," said the Marquise, as she kissed her on the forehead, "this is still my daughter."

"And you still my own dear mother," said M. de Livry; "be kind to and comfort each other. Farewell."

Pauline bowed her head.

"My son," replied the Marquise, "we are saved! There are all your wife's letters—and as to M. de—Fontenay, I can rely on his silence."

"What signifies his silence to me!" cried Ferdinand passionately; "what care I for those letters! It is his life I want. Where he?"

"Gone," said the Marquise.

"Gone!"

"For ever. He is never to return to Toulouse—never to enter France."

"And you suppose that I could not follow him! So long as that man lives I cannot taste of happiness; now is Pauline avenged. Hold me not!"

As he spoke, a servant of the hotel entered the room—his face pale and haggard.

"M. de Fontenay!" cried he—"where is M. de Fontenay! The horses are ready, and he can't be found anywhere. At the very instant of his departure a gentleman came for him, and since that, he is nowhere to be found."

"Oh," said Ferdinand, "let me try if I can't find him."

As he spoke, the double crash of fire-arms was heard from the garden behind the hotel. A cry burst forth from Pauline and her mother-in-law.

"He has killed himself!" cried she.

"No. There were two shots," said Ferdinand: "it was a duel. Who has dared to take my place?"

He tore open the shutter, and by the clear moonlight, which rendered every object palpable as the sun at noonday, M. de Livry saw beneath him in the garden the figure of Clodion, standing pistol in hand, above the body of a man, who lay stretched upon the ground, his face turned upwards towards the blue sky.

"What! it is you, Clodion!" cried de Livry. "Fool! what have you done?"

"A piece of awkardness," said he coolly. "I have forced this M. de Fontenay into a duel, and, without intending it, have contrived to hit him."

"Is he wounded!" cried Ferdinand hastily.

"Dead," said the other.

"Dead!" repeated the three, in accents of horror, and a silence sad and awful followed the words. At last Ferdinand drew near to his wife and said—

"Your son is mine—he shall never leave us."

"What!" cried Clodion, entering abruptly—"What! then it was not Madame de Melcourt, after all!"

"Hush, nephew!" said the Marquise—"we have been all mistaken."

In about two months later, M. M. Clodion Dufour led a blushing bride to the altar of St. Sernin—no other than the handsome widow, Madame de Melcourt.

The grand antepenultimate occurrence of his wedding costume was the admiration of all Toulouse. The report even goes, that he was the first person who wore his hair "en Titus," probably in compliment to the good emperor, because, like him, "he had much to forgive."

SATURDAY POST.

EDITED AND PUBLISHED BY

GEORGE R. GRAHAM & CO.

Philadelphia:

Saturday Morning, August 27, 1842.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will agree with us that we are not in the habit of dunning them often, through the columns of our paper, but in these awfully hard times we must insist on a little more funds from all. Will each one take this matter to himself and send two dollars! This, though a small matter to each, would be greatly serviceable to us. The cash expenses of this establishment are enormous, and it is only by a rigid adherence to the ission for the surrender of of such apprehension and dreyed by the party who ion the fugitive.

ticle of this treaty shall be e date of the ratification, other party shall signify such article shall continue party shall signify its wish treaty shall be duly ratified, ratifications shall take place from the date hereof, or spective Plenipotentiaries, have hereunto affixed our shington, the ninth day of thousand eight hundred and ASHBURTON, [Seal.]

in the subjects—
the Colonial authorities of is with American merchant other, or carried by violence.

Caroline—and risonment—but except that if necessity, is made for the
; an expression of regard for rights is made—nothing is and the President is under e accompanying the Treaty, essary to urge the considera-

PASSED.

venous Bill, as will be seen n Washington. The editor
r says that, in the course of his seat of Government, he ion as that on Monday, when final vote was 105 to 107.
re in no respect from the one
, except in the striking out the abrogation of the duty nerally believed that the bill receive the signature of the are not as wise as they might e best that could be obtained.

tic merchants and manufac-ess than a week, a far better
-like legislators in Congress me of the articles in the pre-and others too low; and there ation in the various articles ercect the crudities of the bill

Carolina, and ple's Book
qual to the combined circulation
all the other cities of the Union
York ers to boast—Philadelphia
ways will be, THE GREAT MART

LEGHANIES.

ther was lately committed in Un-on Friday, the 5th instant, on Connell, of Wrightsborough, in the e county. The crime took place
n Boots. It appears that Kinsey
t Russell, but of which Russell in the foreman of Friday. Kinsey ortsmen at Boots' about having hole conduct indicated that he
he mischief. In the afternoon,
then he and Kinsey got into a deds, and Russell raised his gun of friends, no actual assault was ne after, however, when neither company were suspecting any Russell with his knife, and in mortal wounds, principally in d others more slight, on his leg
d but a few minutes after his
All present were as much asto-concerned for Russell, that he
. It is understood since, that n lives of several other present
red for his apprehension.

RINE EXPERIMENT

testing the power of Colt's bal-taken place in the Potomac, the States, the Heads of Departments, individuals witnessing the exoperation of Mr. Colt was plac-Alexandria. In about twenty gun was fired, the apparatus was a large one, purchased in New entirely disappeared. The timtol. An immense body of water ts of the vessel, rose perpendicuand then descended into the wa-from where the vessel was sted suddenly disappeared, leaving space occupied by the flying ddred feet in the air, did not seem t that filled by the vessel. The ne similar to that when a steam-but extent will not human genius estroying life!

HIA PERIODICALS.

s pulling some new magazine soon, and printed at that office culation of three or four more
"about 50,000." In the cenm's and Godey's. Why the ci-tions is between 75 and 80,000
the following six Philadelphia

Magazine,
Lady's Book,
Evening Post,
Courier,
orld of Fashion, and eople's Book
qual to the combined circulation
all the other cities of the Union
York ers to boast—Philadelphia
ways will be, THE GREAT MART

NG MURDER.

her was lately committed in Un-on Friday, the 5th instant, on Connell, of Wrightsborough, in the e county. The crime took place
n Boots. It appears that Kinsey
t Russell, but of which Russell
in the foreman of Friday. Kinsey
ortsmen at Boots' about having hole conduct indicated that he
he mischief. In the afternoon,
then he and Kinsey got into a de-
ds, and Russell raised his gun of friends, no actual assault was ne after, however, when neither company were suspecting any Russell with his knife, and in mortal wounds, principally in d others more slight, on his leg
d but a few minutes after his
All present were as much asto-
concerned for Russell, that he
. It is understood since, that
n lives of several other present
red for his apprehension.

SATURDAY POST.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, &c.

$2 per annum—$2 if paid in advance; $1.25 in advance or six months.

Postmasters are requested to frank their letters addressed to us. The word "free" of itself is not a frank.

Agents will please endorse their letters with their names or initials.

Other letters will not be taken from the Post office unless the postage is paid.

Papers discontinued only at the end of the current half year's subscription, and then only at the option of the Publisher if arrearages are due.

Small Bank Notes of solvent Banks received in payment for our bills.

Agents are earnestly solicited to make quick remittances, without which it is difficult to keep accounts correct. They should always give names and time paid for.

Any person forwarding Ten Dollars current, free of postage, in advance, will be entitled to six copies.

Removals must always state the Post-office removed from, as well as to which the paper is to be addressed.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Some time has elapsed since we opened our budget, for the warm weather exercises a wonderfully mollifying influence on one; but the longer the scene the more it takes to pay off, so, with a right good will we begin.

"MENDRIN" is accepted, and shall shortly appear.

The stanzas promised to our young friend this week, are postponed until our next paper, in consequence of the press of original matter and selections from the late English Magazines.

"CRANDE," who does "so wish to see himself in print" shall be gratified. We call the attention of the curious to his production. If it don't bring tears into our readers' eyes it will be strange, pressing strange.

Rear it.

"There was a maiden all forlorn,
A mourning for her lover gone—
At early dawn, she rose to go
And seek her lover in the snow.
She had no cloak to keep her warm,
And shield her from the coming storm—
So off she went in a thin gown—
And bound him all over mum."

And so forth to the end of the chapter. It reminds us of the old rhyme,

"Jiggery, jaggery, jugglemore,
The lion has come unto Philadelphy."

We like "A PIECEBOY,"—there is a freshness about his verses that charms us. They are, however, too disdainful of the fetters of rhyme to look well in print. But the spirit is in him; he has only to cultivate art and he will succeed.

The piece entitled "ACROSTICAL" has meritorious lines, but as a whole would scarcely win added smiles from the writer's lady-love. We give the best stanzas.

"Ah! I will sigh to those sweet smiles
Light'ning 'neath thy soul lit eye,
Like summer flash on pearly isles,
Emblazon'd on a twilight sky."

The fine story "ADELAI DORIA," which has been waiting the conclusion of "The Old Loyalist," will shortly appear.

From a poem entitled "THOUGHTS ON THE PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE," we have derived much amusement. The author graphically describes his school-boy days. Thus:

"I remember well one game
It was Sunset by name
When they put down the ball
Then with a very loud call
At it each one struck, and ran
There, one James Stevenson
He did let his club fly
And hit my brother a eye
Which caused him so much pain
He never play'd again
Then, in play, we may see
Youth's not from danger free."

The last two lines of moral reflections are particularly rich. Here is a bit of philosophy

"Minds of youthe various
As the form of the face
That proves the doctrin true
All have their work to do."

The author asks us to punctuate for him, as he is not quite an adept yet! We think we have given sufficient proof to his thyself, at any rate, we have put a stop to them.

The Nut Cracker.

The Boston Transcript has now and then a good thing in it. It lately gave directions for writing poetry to sweethearts. The manner was this. "To begin, then, take from old newspapers old poetry, original and selected, and you will then be in possession of a good stock of words, additions to which may be obtained from Walsh's abridgment. Should you find any two words sound tolerably near alike each other, place one under the other, on the right hand of the paper, thus:

poke.
smoke.

You will find but little difficulty in filling up the line with the usual sentimental phrase.

Dear girl, in your eye my finger I—spoke
To where by the same token that my flame's not alone
Should the lines limp a little by one having a shorter leg than its neighbor, you may dock it by abbreviation, or elongate it by interjection or repetition, thus

Oh! Sophia, Sophia, Sophia, O!
I pain I've got so naughty lost O,
O, thunder—O, lightning—ah! O!

Poetry is measured by the foot, as calico is by the yard. Two syllables make a foot of poetry, and three feet make a yard of calico. In writing very long lines, care must be observed to count the syllables of each line on the fingers, so that in reading, it may come "trippingly off," like the revolution of a grindstone, or the sound produced by a steam sawmill, thus

Dear maid (I've long counted (you be) side of (the brook,
And (am) dever (mined on) having (you by) lock or (by crook.

This is decidedly rich, and we commend it to all love-stricken swains.

Maffit, who, with much bombast, is often really eloquent, is the author of the following passage. Would that he always wrote thus: "Intellect is an enchanter. Long years after loved friends are entombed, the sound of memory wakes over the chill vaults of the sepulchre, and the dead start into life; pale, petrified, passionless as the seraphs, their sweet faces beam again upon us. The fragrance of their spirit breath stirs in their time-bleached locks; their thrilling kisses are upon our lips. With their spirits our spirits again mingle in a better fraternity of feeling than ever bound us before. We invest them with transcendant beauty! they are now lovelier than the Queens of this world, the bosoms throb upon ours with better sympathy; their eyes look deep into ours, with exceeding love. Strange intellectual power! What a contrast of spirit with spirit! What a re-union between the severed! Can it be possible that in this spirit dialogue, but one spirit has a part, answering itself, and creating but an imaginary bliss! No—no. Intellect like a vestra that can summon its bared from the spirit world. In the arms of my soul, I may, with a due submission, to the great father of spirits, clasp the spirit of my dead. Again upon my heart can I lay the spirit babe to whom I sobbed farewell long years gone by. Not only in the arms of my fancy, but really, and indeed, in intellectual affinity, may I embrace my sweet departed daughter, whose angel spirit in life pined for my happiness, and whose last accents, as her tongue frame in death, murmured my name."

We never met with a better illustration of "the bitter bit" than in the following story of a Yankee captain and his mate. Whenever there was plum pudding made by the captain's orders, all the plums were put into one end of it, and that end placed next to the captain, who, after helping himself, passed it to the mate, who never found any plums in his part of it. Well, after this game had been played for some time, the mate prevailed on the steward to place the end which had no plums in it next to the captain. The captain no sooner saw the pudding than he discovered that he had the wrong end of it. Picking up the dish, and turning in his hands, as if merely examining the China, he said—"this dish cost me two shillings in Liverpool,"—and put it down again, as though without design, with the plum end next to himself. "Is it possible," said the mate taking up the dish—"I shouldn't suppose it was worth more than a shilling,"—and, as if in perfect innocence, he put down the dish with the plum end next to himself. The captain looked at the mate—the mate looked at the captain. The captain laughed—the mate laughed. "I tell you what, young one," said the captain, "you've found me out, so we'll just cut the pudding lengthwise this time, and have the plums fairly distributed hereafter."

The Major, of the Germantown Telegraph, has grown modest of late. Hear him.

"We thank our Moreland Friend, for his flattering opinion of the Telegraph and our feeble efforts. We consider it a duty to uphold merit wherever it may exist—and that is the object of this paragraph."

This was all written after the Major's trip to Cape May. He was greatly mortified, we learn, when he found that the devil had spoiled the point of his joke, by spitting it.

The Farmers' and Mechanics' Journal of Gettysburg (a good paper by the bye) has the following pithy sentence in one of its editorials. There is more sound sense in these few words than most Congressional speakers can compress into a three day's oration. We fully endorse the sentiment, "it is high time for the plain people of the country to take the management of their own affairs into their own hands, and elect men from their own ranks to represent them—men who will legislate for the public good instead of the good of their party."

Passengers are now carried to the top of the Bunker Hill Monument in chairs, hoisted by steam. "Much a-gittin up stairs too never did see."

Love poetry is just now very popular with young ladies in their teens, and Tom Moore's songs and tales are read by romantic young men at all the parlours. One of the western editors has lately been favored with an original love poem, addressed to himself—the lucky dog! Accompanying the lines was a lock of hair. As the poem is short, we give it entire.

"This lock of hare
I once did wave,
But now I cast it to your care,
And if we no more each other see,
Then look at this, and think on me."

Who could resist such love-making! Not an editor, especially if he was a bachelor,—to that we are willing to be qualified, as they say at the squire's office. Our editorial brother felt a sort of dizziness in the head, and a choking in the throat, while his heart went like a forge hammer. He couldn't rest until he indited and printed the following:

"Who you are
That sent that hair,
I neither had to, nor I don't care.
I don't know you, tho' you know me,
But I'll try to think, if I don't blow me."

An English paper says that the town of Rhode Island has been disturbed by rebellion, in consequence of which two or three hundred rebels were publicly executed. The denizens of Providence, and along shore will receive this with becoming thankfulness. It will be news to them.

A country editor opens a political article with the following passage, "The battle is over:—the smoke clearing up—the victors rejoicing, and the defeated parties bearing off the dead and wounded. "Whizz!—whizz!!—whizz!!! "Take your time Miss Lucy."

We cut the following political pun from a country paper, not for the politics, but for the wit. "Why will the Whigs carry the next election?" asked one of another. "Don't know," was the reply. "Because all them in the long run must turn to Clay."

At a temperance festival in New Hampshire, the following witty but intemperate toast was given. The Hon. Thomas F. Marshall: The Washingtonians regret to find him a duellist.—They wish he had aimed higher.

Peaches are retailing in New York at three cents each. Hard times indeed!

Notices of New Works.

THE LADY'S WORLD OF FASHION, FOR SEPTEMBER.—C. J. Peterson, 98 Chestnut street.—The number of this elegant and popular periodical for the ensuing month, is already on our table. The embellishments and contents are unusually rich. The first illustration is a splendid steel engraving, entitled "THE EASTERN PRINCESS," and rarely have we seen a plate of more beautiful design, or executed in a higher style of art. The other illustration is a plate of colored fashions, representing three full, and three half length figures, and giving all the choice styles of the season. No periodical now extant rivals this magazine in the finish, and style with which the fashion plates are got up—the figures not being lithographed, but elaborately engraved, and colored with unusual taste. The original matter of the number shows a decided increase of merit in the contributors. We cannot, indeed, do better than give the contents.

Fashions for September, (illustrated); A Dirge; Velasco, or the Elopement, by A. W. Noney; The Faded Flower, by Edwin Eddinson; Memory, by Mrs. G. Norman; The Eastern Princess, (illustrated,) by Mrs. Anne Ford; Remembrance; Lord Percy's Dream; Twilight; The Baron's Knell, by J. H. Dana; Enchantment, by E. J. Porter; Herbert Mordaunt, by George Haydn; Lines in the Evening Star; The Bridal Eve, by Harriet Bowles; The Broken Hearted, by J. Tomlin; Distinguished Strangers, by Gertrude Garland; Rosalie, by H. J. Vernon; Dreaming and Waking; The Young Musician, by Mrs. M. V. Spencer; To a Lady, a Song; The Rose, by D. Everett Rose; What is Duty, by Ellen Ashton.

The high terms in which this Magazine has been spoken of by the press, and the rapidly increasing circulation has determined the publisher, we understand, to renewed exertions; and he has now in hand a series of magnificent mezzotints—which will be given to his subscribers, beginning in October.

A WALK ABOUT ZION.—By Rev. John A. Clark, D.D. Rector of St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia.—We have before us, from the press of Robert Carter, of New York, the fifth edition of this admirable work, revised and enlarged by the author. It is written in a truly liberal and catholic spirit,—and we know of no volume of a religious character that will interest more deeply the general reader, or be productive of more advantage. It is printed in that style of neatness and correctness which distinguishes all Mr. Carter's publications.—H. Hooker, Philadelphia publisher.

THE BOOK OF CAGE BIRDS.—Mr. Bernard Duke, No. 117 Chestnut street, has just published an elegant duodecimo volume, under this title, which will become at once universally popular with those who keep feathered minstrels in their houses. It contains directions for their treatment, anecdotes, &c., and poetry from the pens of David Paul Brown, Henry B. Hirst, Robert Morris, Francis Cosby, Mr. Duke, and other well-known bards.

THE DROWNED, by Sir E. L. Bulwer.—A handsome edition of this novel, with an engraving, has been published by the Harpers' and may be had of Burgess, 2 Ledger Buildings, for twenty-five cents.

HUNGARIAN TALES AND LEGENDS, by Miss Pardoe.—This is an excellent collection of tales, and may be had of Burgess for twelve and a half cents.

Army & Navy.

☞ The following Brevets have been conferred by the President and Senate:—Col. W. J. Worth of the 8th Reg't of Inf., to be Brigadier General from 1st March, 1842. Capt. W. W. Morris 4th Reg't of Art., to be Major from 27th January, 1837. Capt. Robert Anderson, 3d Reg't of Art., to be Captain from 23 April, 1836. Capt. F. Searle, to be Major from 25th November, 1835. Capt. J. R. Irwin to be Captain from 21st August, 1836. Capt. George Andrews 6th Regt of Inf., to be Major from 25th December, 1837. 1st Lieut. J. F. Lee, of the Ord. Dept., to be Captain to date from the 27th January, 1837. 1st Lt. W. H. T. Walker, of the 6th Inf., to be 1st Lieutenant from the 25th December, 1837. 1st Lt. J. E. Johnson, Corps of Top. Engs., to be Capt. from 9th July, 1838. 1st Lt. W. Alburtis, of the 2d Reg't of Inf., to be Captain from 2d of March, 1841. 2d Lt. D. S. Irwin, of the 3d Inf., to be 1st Lieutenant from 7th of September, 1841. All these Brevets are conferred for gallant conduct in the Florida War.

☞ Gen. Worth reports, under date of the 12th inst. the thorough pacification of Florida. Bowlegs, representing the Southern Indians, met the General at Tampa on the 5th inst., and agreed to the concessions offered him. On the 10th inst. he returned with Tiger-tail. They are all to pass within the designated limits as soon as they can be collected. Tiger-tail and others wish to go West. We suppose now it may be said the "Florida war is ended."

☞ Gen. Eustis, of the U. S. Army, is to command the sixth Military Department, comprising the States of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine. His Head Quarters are at Portland.

☞ The United States ship Vincennes, the flag ship of the Exploring Expedition, is undergoing repairs, her timbers having met with rough usage amid the storms of the Atlantic.

☞ The United States Steamship Mississippi arrived at Key West from New York, on the 6th inst., all well.

General News.

☞ The brig Harriet, that has just arrived at Baltimore, from the west coast of Africa, brings the report that on the 26th of April, the schooner Mary Carver, Farwell, of Plymouth, Me., was captured by the natives of Barbary, and the captain, mate and crew murdered, in consequence of a dispute with the natives and the captain. After the capture of the schooner, they informed the captain of their intention to kill him: when he implored them in vain to spare his life. They tied a large stone around his neck, conveyed him some distance from the shore, and then threw him into the sea. The captain, says the Baltimore Argus, has a wife and two children in some part of Massachusetts.

☞ The grand jury of New Orleans, in their presentment, regret that the laws of the State against duelling are so severe that they defeat their own purposes. They are of the opinion that if it were made a crime, punishable merely by imprisonment, and by obliging the survivor to support the family of the victim, the provisions against it would be effectual to its suppression. This doctrine contains a general principle which should never be lost sight of by legislators. It is the true remark of one of the oldest writers on law, that certainly and not severity of punishment is the best preventive of crime.

☞ A Mrs. Turk, residing near Rochester, was on Thursday morning so badly burnt that she is not expected to recover. She was cooking at the door, in a state of partial intoxication, when her clothes took fire, and before assistance arrived, were entirely consumed, reducing almost the whole surface of the body to an entire crisp. Her husband was near by, but not in a situation to render her any assistance. Such are rum's doings.

☞ It is a singular fact, that next to Louisiana, Vermont is the greatest sugar producing State in the Union! The amount of maple sugar produced in 1840, was over 2,550 tons, being over 17½ pounds to each inhabitant allowing a population of 291,948. At five cents a pound this is worth $255,963 20. The Montpelier Watchman states that this quantity is very far below that produced the present year, and thinks it may be safely estimated, that the sugar produced this season will, at the low price of five cents, be worth one million of dollars.

☞ It is confidently believed, in New Orleans, that an agency of the Bank of England has been established in that city, for the circulation of the notes of that institution, and that they already form, to some degree, a paper medium there. It is, moreover, pretty well ascertained that similar agencies are to be established in all the principal cities of the Union.

☞ The French Rasee Frigate Circe, Capt. Ricard arrived in Hampton Roads on Thursday night, in distress. The Circe is from Kingston, Jamaica, bound to Port au Prince, but striking a rock in coming out of Kingston harbor, sprung a leak, and bore away for Norfolk, Va., to repair damages.

☞ In addition to the discoveries made in New Hampshire of crude arsenic, tin, iron, zinc and lead ores, the valuable ore of Titanium has been discovered in the towns of Merrimack and Unity. This article is said to be worth $16 per pound, wholesale, and is used by dentists and porcelain painters.

☞ The National Intelligencer of Monday, mentions the death of Isaac Rand Jackson, Esq., United States Charge at Denmark. Mr. J. was a citizen of Philadelphia, and highly respected by his numerous friends. He died at Copenhagen on the 27th July, after a sickness of three weeks.

☞ Lard oil is now used for almost all the purposes to which Sperm and Olive Oil have heretofore been applied, and with a large saving. It burns well in lamps, acts well on machinery of all sorts, on wool to be manufactured, and it is said sometimes gets upon salads and is eaten.

☞ Paden Stokes, arrested some days since at Smithfield, charged with having robbed the Great Western Mail on the 26th ult., on the road between Wheeling and Frederick, has been brought on to Baltimore and is now confined in jail, awaiting further investigations.

☞ A requisition has been made by Gov. King upon Gov. Hubbard, of New Hampshire, for the surrender of Thomas W. Dorr, charged with treason against Rhode Island, and a fugitive from justice. Gov. Hubbard refused to comply with the requisition.

☞ It is stated that the Government of Canada, with the approbation of Queen Victoria, intends to grant an unqualified amnesty to all persons who were concerned in the recent frontier disturbances and insurrections, without any exceptions.

☞ The steam frigate Gomer, now at New York, has an apparatus for distilling water, which produces an abundant supply. Nearly all the French merchant ships now carry an apparatus for distilling all the water they need.

☞ Orders from Washington were received at the armory at Springfield, (Mass.) directing a general discharge of the workmen, for the ostensible reason that there is no money to pay for a continuance of the work.

☞ The New York Courier says:—"So many emigrants have arrived at this port, and the times are so bad here, that we are sorry to say that every English packet takes them back again by the hundreds."

☞ Among the rumors which are afloat is one, that Judge Ellis Lewis, of Lycoming, (Pa.) would be called into the Cabinet, when the expected changes take place after the adjournment.

☞ Mr. Forward, the Secretary of the Treasury, was in Pittsburg at the latest accounts. It is doubted by some whether he will ever return to Washington, as Secretary of the Treasury.

☞ We learn from a Montreal paper, that there are more than 3000 youths in that city, pledged to total abstinence from ardent spirits.

☞ The crop of hemp in Kentucky is said by gentlemen from that state, to be twice as large as ever before.

☞ The income of the Lord Mayor of London, amounts to between £7000 and £8000 per annum.

☞ Snow fell at Quebec on the 1st inst.

Foreign Intelligence.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

Great Britain—Ireland—Spain—Portugal—Germany—China—Syria—The East—Miscellaneous.

The steamship Britannia arrived at Boston on Friday morning (Aug. 19,) bringing London and Liverpool dates to August 4. The harvests in Great Britain promise to be abundant. There has been a slight improvement in the manufacturing districts. The Cotton Market has been active—lower qualities of American having improved ¼d per pound. The political intelligence furnished by the London and Liverpool papers is not of a very interesting character. The Parliamentary proceedings were entirely destitute of interest. The members of both Houses appear to have been more attentive to party contentions, than to the affairs of the people. Two or three attempts had been made in the House of Commons to bring on the Corn-Law question, but all of them failed. Lord Brougham made a long and eloquent speech in favor of a resolution, calling on the government to take into consideration the present state of the slave trade, with a view to its entire suppression. We give below a digest of the intelligence from the different quarters.

Great Britain.

On the 28th ult. London and its vicinity were visited by a most destructive thunder storm, which did great damage. The steeple of St. Martin's Church was shattered, and other public buildings were severely injured.

Parliament was to be prorogued about the 10th by the Queen in person. The topics of debate have little interest this side of the Atlantic. A motion by Mr. Duncombe to address the Queen stating the ministerial measures to have been insufficient in relieving the national distress, was lost—91 to 147. In the House of Commons, in reply to a question asked by Mr. Cobden, relative to two steam vessels fitting out at Blackwall for the service of Mexico, to be employed against Texas, Sir Robert Peel said that those vessels, the Montezuma and another, were to be at the disposal of the Government of Mexico, but strict orders had been issued that all means should be taken by this country to preserve a strict neutrality.

Great difficulty is experienced in England in collecting taxes, poor rates, &c. In the parish of Strond alone, upwards of 559 rates were returned as not collectable, and this is but a fair sample of many other places.

Ireland.

A good deal of excitement had been produced at Thornfield, near Ballygar, Ireland, by the discovery of a murder committed some ten years ago, by a man who has since occupied a highly respectable station in society. The symptoms of discontent had by no means ceased; and the strong measures of the government in bringing rioters to punishment seemed to avail nothing. The examination of persons connected with the late riots at Ennis, had developed many curious facts in regard to "Ribandism" in Ireland. It appears that the Riband Society had a regular scale of pass-words, suited to every emergency, for escape from officers in case of riots. Thirty-nine indictments for wilful murder have been found against the persons engaged in these riots.

Spain.

Madrid news of the 25th represents the quarrels of the Palaces, i. e., between Argulles and the Grand Lady Chamberlain, as not appeased. It was rumored that Argulles had resigned. Rodil's Ministry is not likely to last. The Infante and Infanta have continued to get leave to tarry in Madrid till the end of the month. Great surprise is manifested in the Spanish Capital by the appointment of the Countess Montejo as lady of honor to the Queen, in the place of Madame Bejada, as the former is said to be notoriously of Carlist principles. The Spanish Government continues to send troops to the Portuguese frontier. Don Moncasa and his family were to leave Madrid for St. Sebastian on the 1st inst.

Portugal.

The commercial and slave trade treaties had been received from England, duly ratified. The ratifications had been exchanged, and the treaties were law in both countries. At a council of state, a decree was issued proclaiming the slave trade piracy, it having been notified that on this decree being promulgated a bill will be brought into the British Parliament, associating England and Portugal in an alliance for the suppression of the slave trade. The Duke of Palmella had declined accepting the portfolio of foreign affairs.

Germany.

The letters from Stuttgardt announce the attendance of the diplomatic representatives of England, France, and America, with the other subordinate ambassadors of neighboring states, who are alluded to as watching, with great vigilance, the consideration of the subject of duties on the diet. The presence of the English Ambassador is stated to be particularly directed to the question of manufactures, while the American Minister promises mutual advantages, should the duty on tobacco and rice be lowered. The French Ambassador has made no proposition respecting a treaty of commerce, and it was supposed he had received orders to wait the result of the elections. A letter from Frankfort-on-the-Oder, date the 21st ult., states that the fair of St. Magnind, which had just concluded, was well supplied with goods, but almost exclusively from the States forming the German Union, which met with a ready sale, but at rather reduced prices. A letter from Berlin, 21st ult., in the German Journal of Frankfort, says:—"The city of Hamburgh has just contracted, through the house of Rothschild and other bankers, a loan of 32,000,000 of crowns, a ninety-three rix dollars, with interest at three and a half per cent. This sum has been placed at the disposal of the Senate, and is destined to the rebuilding of the house which were destroyed."

China.

China news to the 12th of April, and Singapore journals to the 5th of May have been received. It was said that Yang, an imperial commissioner, was en route to offer 40,000,000 dollars to the British for the expenses of the war, and the surrendered opium; also the cession of Hong Kong as the price of peace. The Chinese had already commenced removing the ruins of the rubbish preparatory to rebuilding the Bogue forts. Some fighting had taken place at Ningpo, in which 1100 Britons routed 6000 Chinese, with the loss of 5 to 700 slain. The British had 3 killed and 40 wounded.

The Agra Ukbar, of June 4, says that it was reported that an army of observation would be assembled at Allahabad in the ensuing cold season.

Among the items of intelligence from Scinde, and which may be depended upon as authentic, is an announcement that a large army, said to be 25,000 strong, is advancing from Mashed to Herat, and that very auspicious conferences are being held at Hyderbad, between the Ameers and others, requiring the most vigilant attention of Major Outram. News is received from Jallalabad to the 29th of May. Akbar Khan had demanded 10,000 rupees for General Elphinstone's remains. The Delhi Gazette of the 14th of May mentions that they had been interred, on the 30th of April, within the walls of Jellalabad. Akbar Khan claims that Dost Mahomed be sent back, and that we evacuate the country, leaving an agent at Cabul in exchange for the English captives. The army, it was thought, would not leave the place until they moved to Cabul, there to meet General Nott, from Candahar. The Khyber Pass was being re-occupied by the Afreedes, and the whole road to Cabul stockaded and defended by all the obstructions the enemy could oppose. Captain Mackenzie had returned to Jellalabad on the 9th of May from Lughman, with terms for the release of the prisoners. General Sale's victory over Akbar Khan had struck such terror into the minds of the people that it was thought our troops might have moved on to the capital without resistance, had not the force been deficient in every requisite for so large an army. A letter from Sangor of the 26th of May announces the Bundlelkhands to have fled into the territory of Scindia. Everything remains in statu quo. Half the Candahar force had moved out to re-inforce Kate Gilzie, and make a demonstration on Ghyzee. General England crossed the Kojur Kudul on the 2d May, with the loss of only four men wounded. Instructions had been given on the 14th of May from the Adjutant-general's office to withdraw the troops serving west of the Indus within the British provinces.

Syria.

The state of things in Syria is such as threatens to involve the Porte in a war with the European powers—a war which must result in the final and entire subversion of the Ottoman government. The Porte appears determined not to accede to the demands of the great European powers for a government to Syria which shall insure protection to the Christians of Mount Lebanon against the persecutions of the Druses. One of the members of the Turkish divan is said to have told the British and French ministers plainly, that if they did not blie the Ottoman mode of governing Syria, they might take it and govern it for themselves—a hint which the great European powers will not be slow to act upon, as soon as they can cease to some agreement relative to an equitable division of the spoils among themselves. Meantime, the Christians of Anti-Lebanon are collecting every thing from the mountaineers, whose object appears to be to drive them from a state of passive submission into a war which they trell know will be one of extermination. Almost daily accounts reach Beyrout of some new outrage upon the Syrian Christians, who appear to have given up all hope of the protection so often promised by the Turkish government, and to depend on France and England to right their many and grievous wrongs. No less than twelve sheiks, all of them related to be engaged in Shabab, had sought refuge on board British vessels, where they found full protection. Most of these Christian sheiks who remained had been arrested, under pretext of conspiracy against the government, and it was thought would be severely dealt with. The catholic patriarch of Lebanon had fortified himself, and his numerous followers were determined to defend him to the last, both against the Turks and Druses.

The East.

Private letters from Constantinople of the 13th ult. announce that the Shah of Persia is making preparations for a war against Turkey, and that a Persian army is to march against Bagdad, and another against Erzerum. Troops had already marched from Teheran to Amedan on their way to Bagdad. For some time past there have been allout rumors of war on the Persian frontier, but it was expected they would, as usual, end in smoke. It would appear, however, that matters have become serious. Mahmoud Pacha, who was formerly governor of his native place, Busra, and who remained for some years in disgrace at Constantinople, lately fled to Persia, where he offered his services to the Shah, who gave him the command of an armed force and sent him to invade Turkey in the neighborhood of Suleymanieh. He passed the frontier in hostile array, but was soon met by Injlos Bairakdarkdaoglu Mehmed Pacha, who was sent by the Pacha of Bagdad at the head of 4,000 troops. A fierce attack immediately followed; the Turks were completely triumphant, and such of the Persians as escaped fled the end to Persia again.

Miscellaneous.

The treaty of commerce between Belgium and France has been concluded. Belgian linen and thread are to be still admitted into France on the existing duties, but British articles of that kind are not to be imported into Belgium, except on payment of the duties set forth in French tariff. Belgium is to reduce the duties on French wines one-third. The navigation Act is moreover to be altered so as to give to French salt the advantage on that produced or manufactured in England.

The harvests have generally come in finely, all over Europe. There are some complaints of the drought in the south of France, and in some portions of England and Ireland; but the aggregate crops all over Europe, it is said, will average one quarter beyond any previous year within the memory of the oldest inhabitants.

The wine trade in the south of Europe is in the lowest possible state of depression. This is attributed to three causes—the stagnation of business generally, the abundance of the vintage, and the diminished demand for export, induced by the spread of temperance and the manufacture of imitation wines.

The Greenland whale fishery, as far as the British vessels are concerned, has been again a decided failure, and the owners of the whalers belonging to Peterhead have determined to employ them hereafter in some other enterprise. The foreign vessels were also unsuccessful.

Great anxiety appears to be felt by the Jews throughout Europe, on account of the legislative measures announced as forthcoming at Berlin in regard to their affairs. The Jews have learned to distrust all special legislation relative to their own concerns.

A greater number of fashionably attired scamps, known as the "London swell mob," are prowling about the country towns in England, than were ever known before. They are driven out of London by the hard times, and are generally very closely watched.

The operative masons at Glasgow persevered in their strike for higher wages, until their places were principally supplied from the other towns. The distress among the poorer families, is said to be past description.

The German papers are filled with accounts of hailstorms, which appear to have been severe beyond precedent. Hail stones as large as hen's eggs fell in the neighborhood of Leipsic, on the 25th.

The quantity of silver, in coin and bullion, imported into England from South America, has been greater the past year than on any previous year since the separation of the colonies from Spain.

Nearly one half the people in the island of Harris, one of the Hebrides, were preparing at the last accounts to embark for America. Emigration appears to be the order of the day.

The Russian army under Gen. Grabbe have been defeated by the Circassians, with a loss to the former of 1500 men and 25 officers. The Russian artillery was, however, saved.

The number of persons confined in the London prisons is unusually large. In the Coldbath-fields prison alone there are upwards of 100 confined for various offenses.

The British Parliament proposes to give £30,000 from the Exchequer for the education of the people, and £70,000 for the maintenance of the royal stable!

The death of Admiral Taylor, one of the oldest flag officers in the service, took place at his residence at Greenwich, on Tuesday week, in his 82d year.

The commercial treaty between Great Britain and Portugal, has been finally arranged, and upon terms highly advantageous to both.

The Wesleyan Conference, at London, have elected Dr. Hannah president of the year, and Robert Newton, secretary.

SUGAR FROM INDIAN CORN.

We called the attention of our readers, last year, to this subject; and since then it has been growing in interest. Mr. William Webb, the gentleman to whom we have alluded as having manufactured sugar from corn stalks, has this year renewed his experiments, of which we find an interesting account in the Farmer's Cabinet. It was on Mr. Webb's farm that the experiments were made, which were the basis of Mr. Ellsworth's Report setting forth the advantages of prosecuting this branch of agriculture. We give an extract.

"We have been favored with a visit to the farm of Mr Benjamin Webb, near Wilmington, and have examined the 5th article of the Constitution of the United States (touching proposed amendments to that instrument) the resolution was rejected.

ON THURSDAY, THE SENATE transacted nothing of importance except Executive business.

IN THE HOUSE, Mr. Fillmore, from the Committee on WAYS and MEANS offered the following resolution.

Resolved, That it is expedient to pass another Revenue Bill, the same as that which recently passed both Houses of Congress, and has been returned by the President, with his objections, to this House, and on reconsideration lost for want of a constitutional majority, entitled, "An act to provide revenue from imports and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes, with the exception of the 27th section of said bill, which repeals the provisions to the Land Distribution act, and so modified as to make it as imported in American vessels from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and coffee free of duty; and that the Committee of Ways and Means be, and they are hereby instructed to report such a bill to this House with all convenient despatch."

On this resolution 95 voted in the affirmative, and 114 in the negative. So it was lost.

ON FRIDAY, THE SENATE were engaged in Executive Business.

In the House two or three attempts were made unsuccessfully to suspend the rules and take up a Revenue Bill. At length Mr. C. J. Ingersoll moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, with the view of taking up a Revenue Bill. The motion prevailed, 96 to 84. Mr. C. J. Ingersoll moved to postpone the order of business in order to take up the Bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. The first motion was upon the unfinished business—(a Naval Bill)—when the House were last in Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. The Bill was laid aside accordingly, and the Committee voted to consider the Bill reported by Mr. Ingersoll. The motion prevailed. A long discussion ensued, when the Committee rose that the House might refer the Contingency Bill.

ON SATURDAY, THE SENATE took up the resolution to adjourn. Messrs. Preston and Tallmadge opposed any adjournment until the House should pass a Revenue Bill. The resolution, on motion of Mr. Rives, was laid on the table; then the Senate went into Executive business.

THE HOUSE went into Committee of the Whole, when the Tariff Bill, which was pending when the Committee rose the day before, was laid aside, and the Contingency Bill taken up. The House refused to concur in the Senate's amendments.

ON MONDAY IN THE SENATE the Contingent Bill was taken up, when the Senate insisted on its amendment and requested a conference, consisting of three members on the part of the House, as usual.

IN THE HOUSE, several bills were reported, when Mr. Barnard, of New York, submitted a resolution that all debate in Committee of the Whole upon the Revenue Bill should cease at one o'clock this day, and that the Committee should then proceed to vote upon amendments pending, and which may be offered. The resolution was adopted without yeas and nays. Mr. C. J. Ingersoll was called to the Chair, and the debate proceeded an hour and ten minutes on the Revenue Bill. At the end of that time, Mr. Barnard's bill having been perfected, the question returned upon the substitute proposed by Mr. C. J. Ingersoll. This bill having been read, the vote was taken by tellers, and but 36 members voted for the bill of Mr. C. J. Ingersoll. Mr. McKennan's Bill was the next substitute proposed, and before the bill was presented in the form of an amendment to the amendment, there were various propositions submitted in the shape of amendments. All of these were rejected. When the bill came to a vote upon the amendment, the House decided to take the bill of Mr. McKennan, with the distribution out of it, by a vote of 99 to 67.

The bill was then reported to the House, and a scene of great excitement and anxiety followed for an hour. The first vote upon concurring in the Report of the Committee by substituting the bill of Mr. McKennan for that from the Judiciary Committee. The ayes and nays ordered a test vote, but did not so turn out, and the result was as follows: For the bill, 102; against it, 90. The next question was upon the engrossment of the bill. This vote was taken under an intense feeling of excitement, and the result was for the engrossment 101; against it, 101. The enem

Laver's New Novel.

OUR MESS.

Jack Hinton, the Guardsman.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE MOUNTAIN PASS.

On the whole, the journey to me was a delightful one, and certainly not the least pleasant portion of my life in Ireland. Endowed—partly with his individual gifts, partly from the nature of his sacred functions—with influence over all the humble ranks in life, the good priest jogged along with the assurance of a hearty welcome wherever he pleased to halt, the only look of disappointment being when he declined some proffered civility, or refused an invitation to delay his journey. The chariot was well known in every town and village, and scarcely was the rumble of its wheels heard coming up the street, "when the population might be seen assembling in little groups and knots, to have a word with "the father"—to get his blessing—to catch his eye, or even claim a nod from him. He knew every one and every thing, and with a tact which is believed to be the prerogative of royalty, he never miscalled a name, nor mistook an event. Inquiring other them, for soul and body, he mixed with real interest in all of their hopes and fears, their fairs and anticipations, and talked away about pigs, pensioners, purgatory, and potatoes, in a way that showed his information, on any of those matters, to be of no mean or common order.

By degrees, our way left the more travelled high-road, and took by a mountain track through a wild romantic line of country beside the river Shannon. No villages now presented themselves, and, indeed, but little trace of any habitation whatever; large mishapen mountains, whose granite sides were scarce concealed by the dark heath, the only vegetation that clothed them, rose around and about us. In the valleys, some strips of bog might be seen with little hillocks of newly-cut turf, the only necessitance of man's work the eye could rest on. Village there was none. A dreary silence, too, rugged throughout. I listened in vain for the bleating of a lamb, or the solitary treble of a sheep-bell; but no—save the cawing of the rooks, or the mournful cry of the plover, I could hear nothing. Now and then, it is true, the heavy flapping of a strong wing would point the course of a heron soaring towards the river, but his low flight even spoke of solitude, and showed he feared not man, in his wild and dreary mountains. At intervals we could see the Shannon winding along, far, far down below us, and I could mark the islands in the bay of Scariff, with their ruined churches and one solitary tower, but no sail floated on the surface, nor did an oar break the sluggish current of the stream. It was, indeed, a dreary scene, and somehow my companion's manner seemed colored by its influence, for scarcely had he entered the little valley that led to this mountain track, than he became silent and thoughtful, sketched in reflection, and when he spoke, either doing so at random, or in a vague and almost incoherent way, that showed his ideas were wandering.

I remarked that, as we stopped at a little forge shortly after the period, the priest had taken the smith aside, and whispered to him a few words, at which he seemed strangely moved; and as they spoke together for some moments in an under tone, I perceived by the man's gestures, as well as by the expression of the father himself, that something of importance was being told. Without waiting to finish the little repair to the carriage which had caused our halt, he renounced hastily, and, beckoning me to follow, he mounted, and we took our jaunting car in silence. I confess that my curiosity to know the reason was great, but as I could not with propriety ask, nor did my companion seem disposed, give the information, I contented into a silence unbroken as his own, and we travelled along for some miles without speaking. Now and then the priest would make an effort to relieve the monotony of the way by some remark upon the scenery, or some allusion to the wild grandeur of the pass; but it was plain he spoke only from constraint, and that his mind was occupied on other and very different thoughts. It was some wasting late, and yet no trace of any house or habitation could I see, where to rest for the night. Not wishing, however, to interrupt the current of my friend's thoughts, I maintained my silence, absorbed my eyes on every side, from the dark mountains that towered above me, to the narrow gloomy valley that lay several hundred feet beneath our track—but all in vain. The cabin, or habitation, which I saw, roof, not even a smoke-wreath, could be seen for as the view extended.

The road by which we travelled was scarped from the side of mountain, and formed for some miles pursued a gradually descending course. On suddenly turning the angle of a rocky wall that shorted us for above a mile, we came in sight of a long reach of the Shannon upon which the sun was setting, and all its golden hues. The distant shore of Munster, rich in tillage and pasture-land, was lit up, too, with corn-field and green meadow, leafy woods, and the mountain, all glowing in their brightest hue. It was a vivid and a gorgeous picture, and I should have looked on it long with pleasure, when suddenly I felt my arm grasped by a strong finger. I turned round, and the priest, raising his hook, pointed down into the dark valley below us, as he said in a low and agitated voice—"You see the light—it is there—there." Quickening our pace by every effort, we began rapidly to descend the steep road, which, by a zig-zag road, whose windings seem lost to the view I have mentioned, and left nothing that lay between us and the brown mountains around us. Tired as our poor horse was, the priest pressed him forward, and, regardless of the broken and rugged road, seemed to think of nothing but his haste, muttering between his teeth with a low but rapid articulation, while his face grew pale, and his eye glared intensely, as if he had all the humorous glare and restless look of fever. I endeavored, as well as I was able, to occupy my mind with other thoughts, but with that invincible fascination that turns the eye back to the wave by whose I found herself again and again gazing on my companion's countenance. Every moment now his agitation increased; his lips were pressed close, his brow contracted; his cheek flattened, and quivering with a nervous spasm, while his hand trembled violently as he wiped the big drops of sweat that rolled in agony from his forehead.

At last, we reached the level, where a better road presented itself before us, and enabled us so to increase our speed that we were rapidly coming up with the light, which, as the evening closed in, seemed larger and brighter than before. It was now that Nick, when the twilight seems fading into night, a gray sombre darkness coloring every object, but yet marking grass and rock, pushing on over with some meaning of their remote cause, so that as we came along I could make out the hall and walls of a mud cabin built against the very mountain side, in the gable of which the light was shining. A rapid, a momentary thought flashed across my mind as to what dreary and solitary man could fix his dwelling-place in such a spot as this, when in an instant the priest suddenly pulled up the horse, and, stretching out one hand with a gesture of listening, whispered—"Hark! —did you not hear that?" As he spoke, a cry, wild and fearful, rose through the glooomy valley—at first in one prolonged shriek, then broken as if by echo, it faltered, sunk, and rose again—wilder and madder, till the echoes, catching up the direful sounds, answered and repeated them as through a chorus of unearthly spirits were calling to each other from their caves.

"Oh God! too late—too late," said the priest, as he bowed his face upon his knees, and his strong frame shook in agony. "Oh Father of mercy," he cried, as he lifted his eyes, bloodshot and tearful, toward heaven, "forgive me this—and if unshriven before these——" Another cry, more frantic than before, burst upon us and the priest, muttering with rapid utterance, appeared lost in prayer. But at him I looked no longer, for straight before us on the road, and in front of the little cabin, now not above thirty paces from us, knelt the figure of a woman, whom, were it not from the fearful sounds we had heard, one could scarce believe a thing of life: her cheek was as white as death; she was as still as death; not a tinge, not a ray of color streaked her bloodless cheek; her black hair, long and wild, fell upon her back and shoulders, struggling and disordered; her hands were clasped as she held her stiffened arms straight before her. Her dress bespoke the meanest poverty, and her sunk cheek and drawn-in lips betokened famine and starvation. As I gazed on her stunned breathless as I saw and dread, the priest leaped out, and hurrying forward, called out to her in Irish, but she heard him not, she saw him not—dead to every sense, she remained still and motionless. No feature trembled, no limb was shaken; she knelt before us like an image of stone; and then, as if by some spell that worked within her, once more gave forth the heart-rending cry we heard at first. Now, low and plaintive, like the sighing night-wind, rose fuller and fuller, pausing and continuing at intervals, and then breaking into short and fitful efforts, it grew wilder and more fearful, till, at last, with one outbreak, like the overflowing of a heart of misery, it ceased abruptly.

The priest bent over her and spoke to her; he called her by her name, and shook her several times, but all in vain. Her spirit, if indeed present with the body, had lost all sympathy with things of earth.

"God help her," said he; "God comfort her. This is more affliction."

As he spoke he walked towards the little cabin, the door of which now stood open. All was still and silent within its walls. Unused to see the dwellings of the poor in Ireland, my eye ranged over the bare walls, the damp and earthen floor, the few and miserable pieces of furniture; when suddenly my attention was called to another and a sadder spectacle. In one corner of the hovel, stretched upon a bed, whose poverty might have made it unworthy of a dog to lie on, lay the figure of a large and powerfully-built man, stone dead. His eyes were closed, and the chin bound up with a white cloth, and a sheet, torn and ragged, was stretched above his cold limbs, while on either side of him two candles were burning. His features, though rigid and stiffened, were manly, and honest, bidding the lookers-on to read the character, in effect by his beard and moustache, which appeared to have been let grow for some time previous, and whose black and waving curl looked darker, from the pallor around it. Some few days, perhaps a week, he might have looked like hardiness and severity, but the struggle of departing life might have caused them.

Deadly withdrawing die sheet that covered him, the priest placed his hand upon his heart. It was evident to me from his manner, that he still believed him living, and as he rolled back the covering he felt for his hand. Suddenly starting, he fell back for an instant, and as he moved his fingers backwards and forwards I saw that they were covered with blood. I drew near, and now perceived that the dead man's chest was bad open by a wound of several inches in extent. The rebe had not cut across, and some portion of the heart or lung seemed to protrude. At the slightest touch of the body the blood gushed forth afresh, and ran in streams upon him. He raised his head, too, was cut across the entire palm—the bloods rudely covered at the part. This appeared to have been rudely bound together; but it was evident, from the nature and the size of the other wound, that he could not have survived it many hours.

As I looked in horror at the frightful spectacle before me, my foot struck at something beneath the bed. I stooped down to examine, and found it was a pistol, such as dragoons usually carry. It was broken at the stock and bruised in many places, but still seemed not unserviceable. Part of the lock and was also stained with blood. The clothes of the dead man, clotted and matted with gore, were also there, adding, by their terrible testimony, to the dreadful fear that haunted me. Yes, every thing confirmed it,—murder and crime had been there. A low, muttering sound near made me turn my head, and I saw the priest kneeling beside the bed, engaged in prayer. His hood was down, and he wore a band of scarf of blue silk, and the small cross that contained the last rites of his church was placed at his feet.

Apparently lost to all around, save the figure of the man that by dead before him, he continued, with unceasing low rapidity, prayer after prayer, stopping, ever and anon, to place his hand on the cold heart, or to listen, with his ear upon the livid lips; and then resuming, with greater energy, while the big drops rolled from his forehead, and the agonizing torture he felt convulsed his entire frame.

"Oh God!" he exclaimed, after a prayer of some minutes, in which his features worked like one in a fit of epilepsy—"Oh God, is it there too late?"

He started to his feet as he spoke, and bending over the corpse, with hands clasped above his head, he poured forth a whole torrent of words in Irish, swaying his body backwards and forwards, as his voice, becoming broken by emotion, now sunk into a whisper, or broke into a discordant shriek—"Shawn, Shawn," cried he, as stooping down to the ground he snatched up the little crucifix and held it before the dead man's face, at the same time he shook him violently by the shoulders, and cried, in accents I can never forget, words almost, among which alone I could recognize one word—Thee, the Irish word for God. He shook him till the head rocked horribly from side to side, and the blood oozed from the gaping wound, and stained the ragged covering of the bed. At this instant the priest stopped suddenly, and fell upon his knees, while, with a low, faint sigh, he who seemed dead lifted his eyes and looked around him, his hands grasped the sides of the bed, and, with a strength that seemed supernatural, he raised himself to the sitting posture. His lips were parted and moved, but without a sound, and his filmy eyes turned slowly in their sockets from one object to another, till, at length, they fell upon the little crucifix that had dropped from the priest's hand upon the bed. In an instant the corpse-like features seemed inspired with life—a gleam of brightness shot from his eyes—the head nodded forward a couple of times, and I thought I heard a disordered, broken sound issue from the open mouth, and, a moment after, the head dropped upon the chest, and the hands relaxed, and he fell back with a crash, never to move more.

Overcome with horror, I staggered to the door, and sank upon a little bench in front of the cabin. The cool air of the night soon brought me to myself, and while, in my confused state, I wondered if the whole night not be some dreadful dream, my eyes once more fell upon the figure of the woman, who still knelt in the attitude we had first seen her. Her hands were clasped before her, and from time to time her wild cry rose into the air, and woke the echoes of that silent valley. A faint moonlight lay in broken patches around her, and mingled its beams with the red glare of the little candles within, as their light fell upon her marble features. From the cabin I could hear the sounds of the priest's voice, as he continued to pray without ceasing. As the hours rolled on the priest, fearful lest an attack might be made on him. "Ay, murder, boys—that's the word, and no less. Don't tell me about righting yourselves; and blood for blood, every thing considered it,—murder and crime had been there. A low, muttering sound near made me turn my head, and I saw the priest kneeling beside the bed, engaged in prayer. His hood was down, and he wore a band of scarf of blue silk, and the small cross that contained the last rites of his church was placed at his feet.

Apparently lost to all around, save the figure of the man that by dead before him, he continued, with unceasing low rapidity, prayer after prayer, stopping, ever and anon, to place his hand on the cold heart, or to listen, with his ear upon the livid lips; and then resuming, with greater energy, while the big drops rolled from his forehead, and the agonizing torture he felt convulsed his entire frame.

"Oh God!" he exclaimed, after a prayer of some minutes, in which his features worked like one in a fit of epilepsy.—"Oh God, is it there too late?"

He started to his feet as he spoke, and bending over the corpse, with hands clasped above his head, he poured forth a whole torrent of words in Irish, swaying his body backwards and forwards, as his voice, becoming broken by emotion, now sunk into a whisper, or broke into a discordant shriek:—"Shawn, Shawn," cried he, as stooping down to the ground he snatched up the little crucifix and held it before the dead man's face, at the same time he shook him violently by the shoulders, and cried, in accents I can never forget, words almost, among which alone I could recognize one word—Thee, the Irish word for God. He shook him till the head rocked horribly from side to side, and the blood oozed from the gaping wound, and stained the ragged covering of the bed. At this instant the priest stopped suddenly, and fell upon his knees, while, with a low, faint sigh, he who seemed dead lifted his eyes and looked around him, his hands grasped the sides of the bed, and, with a strength that seemed supernatural, he raised himself to the sitting posture. His lips were parted and moved, but without a sound, and his filmy eyes turned slowly in their sockets from one object to another, till, at length, they fell upon the little crucifix that had dropped from the priest's hand upon the bed. In an instant the corpse-like features seemed inspired with life—a gleam of brightness shot from his eyes—the head nodded forward a couple of times, and I thought I heard a disordered, broken sound issue from the open mouth, and, a moment after, the head dropped upon the chest, and the hands relaxed, and he fell back with a crash, never to move more.

"Come home to her people, most likely," answered the priest. "Her misfortunes will make her a home in every cabin. None so poor, none so wretched as not to succor and shelter her. But let us leave."

We walked forth from the hovel, and the priest, closing the door after him, fastened it with a padlock that he had found within, and then placing the key upon the lintel, he turned to me, and, with a sad smile, shook his head, my hand in both of his, and said, in a voice of touching earnestness:—

"This has been a sad scene. Would to God you had not witnessed it. Would to God, rather, that it might not have occurred. But promise me, on the faith of a man of honor, and the word of a gentleman, that what you have seen this night you reveal to no man, until I have passed away myself, and stand before that judgment to which we all are coming."

"I promise you faithfully," said I. "And now let us leave a spot that has thrown a gloom upon my heart, a life long will never obliterate."

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE JOURNEY.

As we issued from the glen the country became more open, patches of cultivation presented themselves, and an air of comfort and condition superior to what we had hitherto seen was observable in the dwellings of the country people. The road led through a broad valley bounded on one side by a chain of lofty mountains, and on the other separated by the Shannon from the swelling hills of Munster. Deeply engaged in our thoughts, we travelled along for some miles without speaking. The scene we had witnessed was of that kind that seemed to forbid our recurrence to it, save in our own gloomy reflections. We had not gone far when the noise of horsemen on the road behind us induced us to turn our heads. They came along at a sharp trot, and we could soon perceive that although the two or three foremost were civilians, they who followed were dragoons. I thought I saw the priest change color as the clank of the accoutrements struck upon his ear. I had, however, but little time for the observation, as the party soon overtook us.

"You are early on the road, gentlemen," said a strong, powerfully-built man, who, mounted upon a gray horse of great bone and action, rode close up beside us.

"Ah, Sir Thomas," said the priest, addressing him in a tone of some, but very much subdued, cordiality—"Ah, Sir Thomas, I see you are the same as ever." George there. Is there anything wrong in this journey?"

"Why, I hope not, for your sake," said the knight in answer. "How long have you been in it, and where did you pass the night, not to hear of what has occurred?"

"Faith, a home question," said the priest, summoning up a hearty laugh to conceal his emotion: "but if the truth must out, we came round by the priory at Glen, and as my friend here is an Englishman, I felt it my duty to present him to you—Mr. Hinton—Sir Thomas Garland—he heard wonders of the monks' way of living up there, and I wished to let him judge for himself."

"Ah, that accounts for it," and the tall man to himself. "We have had a sad affair of it, Father Tom, here since we parted yesterday."

"Murdered?" said the priest, with an expression of horror in his countenance I could scarcely believe feigned.

"Yes, murdered. The house was attacked a little after midnight. The party must have been there one, for while they forced in the hall-door, the haggard and the stables were seen in a blaze. Poor George had just retired to bed, a little later than usual, for his sons had returned a few hours before from Dublin, where they had been to attend their college examination. The villains, however, knew the house well, and made straight for his room. He was up in an instant, and, seizing a sword that hung beside the bed, defended himself with the courage of desperation against them all. The scuffle and the noise soon brought his sons to the spot, although none could be heard in the sound and stout manner. Overpowered at last by numbers, and covered with wounds, they dragged Tarleton down the stairs, shouting out as they went, 'Bring him down to the others; and springing to the top of a low wall that skirted the road, continued to load a musket at the door for some minutes together. The thought flashed on me at the moment, that perhaps my being a stranger to them might have caused their hesitation, and I waved my hat a couple of times above my head. Upon this they resumed their march, and in a few minutes more drew standing beside me. One of them, who was an old man, with hair, whitened under many campaigns, and a face of Irish, but correcting himself, at once asked, in a low, steady voice:—

"Was he present in time? Did he get the rites?"

I nodded in reply; when he muttered, as if to himself:—

"God's will be done. Shaun didn't tell of Hogan——"

"Which father—which?" said one of the younger men, as he laid his hand upon the old man's arm; while he added something in Irish, gesticulating with energy as he spoke.

"Is Mary come back, sir?" said the third, as he touched his hat to me respectfully.

"The woman—his wife?" said I; "I have not seen her to-day."

"She was up with us, at Kiltimmon, at two o'clock this morning, but wouldn't wait for us. She wanted to get back at once, poor creature. She bears it well, and is the stout heart. Faith, maybe before long she'll make some others faint in their hearts, that have stricken here this night."

"We are calm, then" said I.

"As you see them sensible, and sure enough she helped me, with her own hands, to put the horse in the car; for, you see, I couldn't lift the shaft with my one arm."

I now saw that his arm was bound up, and buttoned within the breast of his coat.

The priest now joined us, and spoke for several minutes in Irish; and, although ignorant of all he said, I could mark, in the tone of his address, his look, his manner, and his gesture, that his works were those of rebuke and reprobation. The old man heard him in silence, but without any evidence of feeling. The others, on the contrary, seemed deeply moved by the language of the two, whose arm was broken, seemed greatly moved, and the tears rolled down his hardy cheeks.

These signs of sorrow seemed to have evidently displeasing to the old man, whose nature was of a stamp far more cruel mould; and, as he turned away from the party to the cabins, he muttered, in a low, but very, distinct voice:—"Never speak to me nor question me about what we saw last night, and try only to remember it as a dream. And now let me tell you how I intend to amuse you in the far west."

Here the priest began a spirited and interesting description of the scenery and the people—their habits, their superstitions, and their pastimes. Sustaining the interest of his account with legend and story—now grave, now gay; sometimes stalling a rent from the world to stares, without as much as a sheaf of straw to lie upon, or potatoes enough for the children to eat."

"Wisdom, father, or the priest will hear ye," said the younger man looking cautiously around him.

"Sorrow, bit o' me cares; if he does, it's truth I'm telling. You are not long in these parts, sir, as I may make no bowl!"

"No," said I, "I'm quite a stranger."

"Well, anyhow, ye may understand that this isn't a fine soil for a potato-garden; and yet, the devil a other poor Shaun had, since they turned him out on the road last Michaelmas-day, himself, and his wife, and the little gossoon—the only one they had, too—with a fever and ague upon him. The poor child, however, didn't feel it long, for he died the place was a-low—but, well, well! the ways of God there's no saying against. But sure, if the little boy didn't die, Shaun was off to America, for he had his passage, and got a pre-chest of a friend, and was all ready to go; but you see, when the child died, he could not bring himself to leave the grave; and there he used to go and spend half of his days fitting it, and setting the sods about it, and wishing it was a deep's work there any of the neighbors; and at last he went off one night, and we never knew what was become of him till a parcel of couple word that he and Mary was living in Clare Bog, seven from everybody, and it depend to us if God take your 'em!—It's deep enough, Mickey—there's nobody will turn him out of this. And so, sir, he might have lived for years yet, but when he heard that the hors was up, and going to settle a reckoning with Mr. Tarleton—"

"Come you," cried the priest, who joined on at the moment, and from whose tone I could perceive was evidently displeased at the old man's coarse pertinence—"come you; the sooner you all get back the better. We have seen enough after Mary, too, for God knows where she is wandering. And now let us put the poor boy in the earth."

With slow and sullen steps the old man entered the house, followed by the others, who, as they approached them, but stood beside the grave, my mind full of all I heard. In a few minutes they returned, carrying the coffin, one corner of which was borne by the priest himself. Four boards were here, and their features were pale and care-worn. They placed the body in the grave, and gazed down after it for some seconds. The priest spoke a few words, in a low, broken voice, the very sounds of which, though their meaning I knew not, made me, sank deep into my heart. He whispered for an instant to one of the young men, who went into the cabin and speedily returned carrying with him some of the clothes of the deceased, and the old cerbine that lay beneath the bed.

"These them in the grave, Mickey—throw them in," said the priest, as he turned to him.

"It isn't there, sir," said the man. "That's every thing that has a mark of blood upon it."

"Throw me into that grave," cried the priest, and at the same moment he took the cartouch to the end of the barrel, and by one stroke of his strong foot snapped it at the breech.

"My curse be on you," said he, as he kicked the fragments into the grave, "there was peace and happiness in the land before then knew ye, and cursed ye. Ah! Hogh," said he, turning his eyes fiercely on the old man, "I never and ye hadn't goods and trade, and some ones, here and there, to lose, God help you, if you think that no easy consequence and a happy home can be bought by murder." The old man stared at the words, and as his dark brow lowered, and his lip trembled, I drew near to take their spades from the car, and began digging the grave; while Father Loftus, leading the other side, talked to him for some time in the Irish tongue.

"Be gorra," said the old man, as he shovelled the earth to either side, "Father Tom isn't like himself, at all, at all. He used to have pity, and the kind word for the poor, when they were hunted down in the world to stares, without as much as a sheaf of straw to lie upon, or potatoes enough for the children to eat."

"Wisdom, father, or the priest will hear ye," said the younger man looking cautiously around him.

"Sorrow, bit o' me cares; if he does, it's truth I'm telling. You are not long in these parts, sir, as I may make no bowl!"

"No," said I, "I'm quite a stranger."

"Well, anyhow, ye may understand that this isn't a fine soil for a potato-garden; and yet, the devil a other poor Shaun had, since they turned him out on the road last Michaelmas-day, himself, and his wife, and the little gossoon—the only one they had, too—with a fever and ague upon him. The poor child, however, didn't feel it long, for he died the place was a low—but, well, well! the ways of God there's no saying against. But sure, if the little boy didn't die, Shaun was off to America, for he had his passage, and got a pre-chest of a friend, and was all ready to go; but you see, when the child died, he could not bring himself to leave the grave; and there he used to go and spend half of his days fitting it, and setting the sods about it, and wishing it was a deep's work there any of the neighbors; and at last he went off one night, and we never knew what was become of him till a parcel of couple word that he and Mary was living in Clare Bog, seven from everybody, and it depend to us if God take your 'em!—It's deep enough, Mickey—there's nobody will turn him out of this. And so, sir, he might have lived for years yet, but when he heard that the hors was up, and going to settle a reckoning with Mr. Tarleton—"

"Come you," cried the priest, who joined on at the moment, and from whose tone I could perceive was evidently displeased at the old man's coarse pertinence—"come you; the sooner you all get back the better. We have seen enough after Mary, too, for God knows where she is wandering. And now let us put the poor boy in the earth."

With slow and sullen steps the old man entered the house, followed by the others, who, as they approached them, but stood beside the grave, my mind full of all I heard. In a few minutes they returned, carrying the coffin, one corner of which was borne by the priest himself. Four boards were here, and their features were pale and care-worn. They placed the body in the grave, and gazed down after it for some seconds. The priest spoke a few words, in a low, broken voice, the very sounds of which, though their meaning I knew not, made me, sank deep into my heart. He whispered for an instant to one of the young men, who went into the cabin and speedily returned carrying with him some of the clothes of the deceased, and the old cerbine that lay beneath the bed.

"These them in the grave, Mickey—throw them in," said the priest, as he turned to him.

"It isn't there, sir," said the man. "That's every thing that has a mark of blood upon it."

"Throw me into that grave," cried the priest, and at the same moment he took the cartouch to the end of the barrel, and by one stroke of his strong foot snapped it at the breech.

"My curse be on you," said he, as he kicked the fragments into the grave, "there was peace and happiness in the land before then knew ye, and cursed ye. Ah! Hogh," said he, turning his eyes fiercely on the old man, "I never and ye hadn't goods and trade, and some ones, here and there, to lose, God help you, if you think that no easy consequence and a happy home can be bought by murder." The old man stared at the words, and as his dark brow lowered, and his lip trembled, I drew near to Literary Varieties.

PORTRAIT OF LUTHER.

People in France have conceived a totally false idea both of the German reformation and of the principal person that accomplished it. The chief cause of this misapprehension is, that Luther was not only the greatest man, but the most thoroughly German one, that has ever appeared in our annals; that his character united in perfection all the virtues and all the faults of the Germans—and that he is the living symbol of all the German Moralisme. He had, in fact, qualities which are so rarely conjoined, that we commonly consider them as incompatible with each other. He was at once a mystical dreamer and a man of action. His thoughts had not only wings but hands. He spoke and (rare occurrence!) he did too: he was both the tongue and the sword of his age. Luther was, at the same time, a cold scholastic, a splitter of words, and an inspired prophet, intoxicated with the influence of the Divinity. After having passed the day painfully in wearing out his mind with dogmatical discussions, when evening came he would take his lute, and gazing on the stars, surrender himself to ecstatic outpourings of poetry, and divine his soul in melody. The same man who could throttle his antagonists with the coarseness of a fishwoman, could also modulate himself to a tone of language soft and sweet as that of an amorous virgin. Full of the sacred terrors of the Lord, ready for all sacrifices to the Spirit, he could lift himself to the purest realms of heavenly contemplation; and yet he was perfectly acquainted with the magnificences of this earth, and appreciated them honestly, and from his mouth fell that famous proverb,

> Wer nicht liebt Wein, Weiber, und Gesang,
> Der bleibt ein Narr sein Lebenlang.—i. e.
>
> Who loves not women, wine, and song,
> Will be a fool his lifetime long.

In short, he was a complete man. To call him a spiritualist would be as absurd as to give him the title of a sensualist. What shall I say? there was something about him fresh, original, miraculous, inconceivable—that which all the Providential men have, a certain terrible simplicity, a rude and uncouth wisdom: he was sublime and narrow minded. Little does it become us to complain of the narrowness of his views. The dwarf mounted on the giant's shoulders, may, no doubt, see farther than him, especially if he wears spectacles—but with our high position we miss the lofty sentiment—the giant's heart which we cannot make our own. Still less does it become us to speak harshly of his faults: they have been more useful to us than the virtues of thousands of others. The delicacy of Erasmus and the mildness of Melanchton would never have given us such an impulse as we owe to the brutality of Brother Martin.—Heine.

BULLY always regretted the appointment of Marie de Medicis to the regency of France. He gives the following picture of the palace after the death of Henry the Great:—"Let us take a view, then, of this new world, as it was constituted after the first three days succeeding the assassination of my beloved master. The Louvre, if we survey the outward appearance, might have been thought still to have mourned; all the refinements of melancholy pomp were to be found there; the hangings with which the walls were covered, the furniture, and all the parade of funerals of public mourning made the place look as if it had been stricken by death and sorrow. But if we were to look a little farther, and consider the commonness and meanness of those who dwelt therein, notwithstanding their grief might appear a little doubtful, for if some of them shed real tears, and heaved sighs from the heart, there were others who gave indications of very different emotions. But if we descended from the rooms devoted to state mourning, and visited the lower range of chambers on the ground-floor, we might there form a true notion of the disposition all hearts were in; that magnificence (assumed on account of the great) had not entirely vanished, and we feel that women hardly do a greater favor to our bodies in these days of dieting, than to encourage that well tried, efficient remedies, dispatchy those we have tried themselves.

Editor of the "Lynn Record," Mass.

From the Rev. A. R. Hinckley.

PEARMILL, N. HAVEN, March 19th, 1841.

Your Medicines have been extensively used in this place, especially the Expectorant. I have received much benefit from the use of this myself and one of my sisters, who for years had been afflicted from childhood with the Asthma, so severely that she was confined with it during the winter, has entirely relieved about once a week, has been to all appearance perfectly cured.

A. R. HINCKLEY.

ONEIDA, N. Y., July 7th, 1841.

Dear Sir:—We want some more of your Expectorant, particularly the Expectorant, which gives universal satisfaction.

Respectfully yours,

BLOSSOM & WILLIAMS.

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y., May 31, 1841.

Dr. Jayne, Dear Sir.

Your Expectorant is in great demand and sells well, and is very popular. Your Vermifuge is now much used, as also is your Tonic Mixture.

Yours, &c. BENJAMIN GREENE.

Prepared only by Dr. D. JAYNE, No. 20 SOUTH THIRD STREET, Philadelphia.

NO EXCUSE FOR A BALD HEAD.

"Since the important discovery of DR. JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC, every one may, if he chooses, procure an abundant growth of the finest, most healthy hair, and with certainty have his hair restored again by a faithful and persevering application of this valuable HAIR TONIC.

Please to read without prejudice the following testimonial, which, in addition to the thousands of others of equally valuable, should remove the doubts of every reasonable person of the efficacy and superior value of JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC.

HAMILTON, Feb. 13, 1840.

Dr D Jayne—Dear Sir—I cannot say my hair is restored, but I can say that it appears to be in as vigorous state of vegetation as could reasonably be expected. I had not finished the bottle before a decided change was perceptible, not in the part of the head to which it was applied. A new growth of fine silver hair, such like that of a child, appeared and has continued to increase and I have had it cut two or three times, I have received compliments on the improvement, and have been a good deal irregular in the use of the Tonic from the best, and from that cause I think the effect is at present less than it otherwise would have been.

I began the use of the Tonic with little or no faith that would ever be successful on my bald head, but I have ever been in the habit of recommending it to others, and I cannot in conscience withhold my testimony in favor of the efficacy of the Tonic, which I believe will produce the appearance of my head when to your office. I remain yours truly, &c. Rev. Dr. Bedell, Rector of Christ Church, Hamilton.

Dear Sir—I have had it (at those parts which were nearly destitute of any thing but sort of down) cut twice, and it is now through quite thick. I am flattered with sanguine hopes of final success, in the diligent use of your Tonic which, I believe, I have throughout which have advertised in the papers. I am constrained to believe it will do it (times to be, and if it makes the hair grow, and no mistake, at least on some heads.

GEORGE W. EATON

Professor in Hamilton University near Utica.

Madison county N. Y.

From the Sacramento (N. J.) Whig.

Some time since I called at the Store of Dr. Jayne, and bought for Dr. Jayne's celebrated HAIR TONIC, to restore my hair which was then falling out daily. I procured one bottle, and applied its contents according to the directions. When the bottle was exhausted I discovered a little down upon my head, to my satisfaction that the YOUNG HAIR was first surprise and secondly I therefore purchased another, and on so last I had now a fine healthy, and new, and a vigorous growth of hair, which I can see every.

And what is more surprising, my baldness was not occasioned by sickness, in which case there is greater hope of restoration, but was hereditary.

April 16, 1841. JAS. O. ROGERS, Methodist Minister.

Wood Bridge, Somerset Co. N. J.

JAYNE'S HAIR TONIC.—After giving this article a fair trial, we unhesitatingly pronounce it the best article without any exception, in use, for the restoration and preservation of the human hair. We know of numerous instances where hair has been restored to heads which have been bald for years, and we feel confident that it is far superior to recommend all our readers who are losing their hair to make a trial of this Tonic immediately.—Boston Mirror, May 1, 1841.

PHILADELPHIA, May 19, 1840.

Dr. Jayne—Dear Sir—I feel that I can hardly say enough in favor of your Hair Tonic. My hair had been falling off about two years and had become very thin (breaking special baldness when I commenced using your Tonic) and for a week it ceased to fall off. I have used it now about three months and have all that I ever had of hair as I can possibly desire. I have recommended its use to many friends, who all speak well of it. If faithfully employed, I have no doubt of its general success. I may add that before using your Tonic, I had tried most of the various articles recommended for the hair, such as the Macassar Oil, all the different preparations of Bear's Oil, Vegetable Hair Oil, &c., &c., without experiencing much if any benefit.

Respectfully yours, S. S. FITCH M. D.

No. 176 Chestnut street.

HADDONFIELD, N. J., Feb. 12, 1839.

Dr. D. Jayne—Sir—I take great pleasure in informing you that the bottle of Hair Tonic which I obtained of you, has proved most satisfactory and successful. My hair has been for some time past in a state of thinness, and I had resorted to it had no fallen out, that my head had become almost entirely bald. I was under the necessity of wearing the bald nose, by reaching the hair on the nose over it. But now, after using about half a bottle of your Tonic, I have a good growth of hair as I ever had.

C. C. FAUS.

Late Pastor of Baptist Church at Haddonfield, N. J.

Prepared only by Dr. D. JAYNE, No. 20 SOUTH THIRD STREET, Philadelphia.

DR. JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM.—This is one of the most delicate, efficient, safe and valuable medicines ever offered to the public for the cure of the various complaints of the human stomach and bowels, and the only medicine worthy of the high confidence in the cure of CHOLERA MORBUS, CHOLERA INFANTUM, DYSENTERY, DIARRHOEA, and all other complaints of the stomach and bowels.

Dysentery, Diarrhoea, or Looseness, Cholera Morbus, Sour Complaints, Colic, Griping Pains, Sour Stomach, Gas in the Bowels, Nausea, Headache, Waterbrash, Pain or Sickness in the Stomach, Vomiting, Spitting of Food after Eating, Costiveness where it passes through the body unchanged, Want of Appetite, Restlessness and Inability for Rest, Wind in the Bowels and Bowels, Hysterics, Cramp, Nervous Tremors and Weakness, Sea Sickness, Fainting, Melancholy and Low Spirits, fretting and crying of infants and for all doses of Intense and Nervous pain.

Prepared only by Dr. D. JAYNE, No. 20 South THIRD street, Philadelphia. And is sold by all respectable Druggists throughout the United States. Price 25 cents.

WORMS IN CHILDREN.—OF ALL DISEASES to which children are exposed, none are so to them as those which the various worms, which they harbor in their bowels, produce, they either produce alarming effects without being suspected. They are not only a cause of disease themselves, but by their irritation aggravate all other diseases, wasting from the part of the body to which they attach themselves, forming large holes and obstructing the bowels, and frequently by their irritation, causing convulsions, and too often death. The remedy will be found in DR. JAYNE'S TONIC VERMIFUGE, which will very soon expel every the worms and consequently prevent of digestion so as to prevent a cure of them.

Prepared only at No. 20 South THIRD St. Philada. 1 2

IMPERMEABLE MATERIALS.—M. P. SIMONE Impermeable Materials Cloth and Paper Manufacturer, also importer of Patent Leather, Linen Asbestos, with every other article used in the art. Orders from any part of the country attended to with the same care as if personal, and at the shortest notice, at No. 173 Chestnut street, Philadelphia. Refer to the State Bank, Philadelphia.

N. B. A liberal discount to any operators who buy to sell again.

A VERY desirable FARM for sale.—The subscriber offers to sell that valuable farm on which he now lives, situated in the township of Upper Oxford and Lower Chester county, Pa. Where there is a good Farmer's Stand, suited for farming purposes, combining the raising of grain and the grazing of cattle. The improvements are good, a good and lively Bar and a half acres of good land, with suitable buildings and all the necessaries for the proprietor of a tavern. The owner is so desirous of selling, that a reasonable price will be taken, and possession given, if desired next fall.

Persons who may wish to view such property will please apply directly to the owner for particulars.

MARSHALL W. ATKIN

IMPORTANT TO THE DEAF.—We commend to the particular attention of those deafness and hearing received "Reader's Gift for Deafness." It contains a high opinion of by those who have used it and who know its value.—Lady Chronicle.

Country merchants and druggists, who are in want of the Compound Economic Aromatic Oil, a medicine that is a certain cure for Deafness and Diseases of the Ear, can order the preparation by sending their orders to their friends in the city, or to D. Jayne, No. 20 South Third street, or S. S. Fitch, corner of Eighth and Walnut, who have the medicine at wholesale or retail.

Price $10.00 per dozen, or $2 for a single bottle. Torrence's Letters need be post paid.

CANKERING CURED, and Instruction given in Dentistry by Dr. J. Gossard, No. 156 Mulberry street, Philadelphia. 1 2

GIBBON'S BOOK BINDERY, No. 90 CHESTNUT Street above Third, next the office of Graham's Magazine, Philadelphia.

Books will be bound at this establishment in any manner that may be desired, from the plainest to the most elegant style.

Rich Velvet, Satin or Silk Binding, with Gold, Silver, or Plated Bands, Ornaments and Clasps, and Silver or Gilt Letters.

Calf, Turkey Morocco, and Morocco, Plain or Extra, Sheep, Even, and Cloth, either full or half Binding.

Particular attention will be given to the Binding or re-Binding the Books of Public or Private Libraries, Works of Engravings, Periodicals, Albums, Books for Presents, and every other variety of Job Work.

Books sent directed to J. L. Gibbon to the care of G. R. Graham & Co. will be promptly attended to. Prices reasonable.

TERMS CASH.

July 16 1f